MARRIED.

In Hopkinton, R. I., March 4, by Eld. D. Coon, Mr. JOHN G. RAYNOR to Miss MARY L. WILCOX, daughter of Lorin Wilcox.

DIED.

In the town of Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., Feb. 26th, Miss SATURNA E., daughter of Mr. Paul Green, Jr., aged 18 years. We cannot permit a sister so young, and dear by holy ties, to pass to the grave with only a passing notice. Though but 18 years of age, Saturna had been three years a follower of the Saviour, and an efficient co-worker in the church of which she was a member. Her presence will be missed, where it has long been highly prized, in the prayer and covenant meeting, whilst the light and frivolous party of pleasure will not lose in her death a participator or co-operator. She has left us with a bright evidence that she was prepared for the inheritance of the sanctified; and our mourning is not without hope. For the past two years her health has been feeble; but during her affliction Christian meekness and fortitude have lent her their aid. At last her death was sudden, and by her unexpected. "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." J. S.

In Alfred, Feb. 19th, DIADAMA PERRY, wife of Benza Perry, in the sixty-fifth year of her age. She was a member of the second Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred. She had been declining in health for a long time. She bore her sickness with patience, and died in the full hope of immortality.

In Alfred, March 1st, LOIS, wife of Lee Clair. She had suffered much for some weeks from a derangement of the liver. She was a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred. She lived an ornament to her profession, and died in the triumphs of faith.

In Mount Carmel, Ill., Jan. 31st, of a disease of the lungs, Eld. SALEM A. LEWIS, son of Thomas Lewis, of Almond, in the 29th year of his age. He died in hope of immortal life beyond the grave.

At Hebron, Potter Co., Pa., Feb. 27th, 1854, OSCAR, son of Albert G. and Candace Davis, aged 13 years and two days. He gradually wasted under the strong hand of disease, till life ceased like the going out of a taper. The spirit's flight was not marked by a sigh or a motion. H. W. B.

Alfred Academy;

A First Class Male and Female Seminary.

ITS location, on the New York and Erie Railroad, two miles from the Alfred Depot, is romantic, retired, and healthy. The course of instruction is divided into ten departments, with an experienced Professor at the head of each. The edifice containing the chapel, recitation, society and library rooms, is one of the largest and finest school structures in Western New York. The supervision of the students is parental, and well adapted to securing their highest intellectual and moral discipline.

The next term commences Wednesday, March 29th. Expenses moderate. For circulars, apply to Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order CHIMES of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

Every Man has his Fault.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

Take life as it is—'tis folly to sigh,
Or to seek for a treasure, when seeking is vain;
If friendship's a light that goes speedily by,
Regretting its loss is but adding to pain;
Perfection's a thing rarely found upon earth;
We may cherish the hope, and our fancy exalt,
But though we meet many of honor and worth,
We find, before long, every man hath his fault.

If a world we require that will always be true,
We must learn where it is from the fairies or elves;
The errors of friendship are easy to view,
Not so easy the errors that lie in ourselves.
No; perfection's a thing rarely found upon earth;
We may cherish the hope, and our fancy exalt,
But though we meet many of honor and worth,
We find, before long, every man hath his fault.

Rents in New York.

Some idea may be formed of the regular advance of the demands of the landlords in New York by the following statement:—

That portion of Clinton Hall, in Nassau-st., occupied by Fowlers & Wells, nominally two stores, each 20 by 40 feet, with a cellar, they took in 1845 at a rent of $300 a year for the whole premises, which was considered a very fair rent for the owner. The next spring, however, he concluded they would pay another hundred rather than move, and so he did the next, and next spring. In 1849 he put up the rent to $800, and the year after to $1,200. At this there was some demurring, but then they were fixed in business there, and had better stand the advance. In 1851, finding they stood $1,200 so well, he concluded they would stand $1,500 just as well, and so they did. In 1852 all rents went up, and of course theirs must take that road, $500 at a leap. In 1853 it took an equal stride, and now stands at Twenty-five Hundred Dollars for the same premises which they paid $300 for nine years ago.

The advance would be up to $3,000 for the year commencing May first, which, as a matter of course, the occupants would pay, but the Nassau Bank has become possessed of the property, and Clinton Hall, late the property of the Mercantile Library, is now to be pulled down, notwithstanding it is one of the most substantial buildings in the city, having walls two feet thick.

Directly opposite Clinton Hall there are six small stores, three-story brick buildings, in the old style, which the present owner bought three years ago for $28,000. He has lately been offered the same price for one of the six, the corner of Nassau and Beekman-st. We presume that the tenants will discover the advance before the 1st of May.

The advance upon the rents of dwelling houses is not as great as upon stores. A house which brought $400 four years ago, brings about $700 now. Such a house would have about the following amount of room: A basement with a hall and stairway upon one side, and eating-room and kitchen on the other, each of them big enough to seat about a dozen persons at the table. Below a cellar for coal and wood, and in the rear a yard ten feet by twenty. On the first floor a front and back parlor, each of them about the size that a bedroom should be. The two upper floors are divided into four rooms each, two of them with grates, and the other two called single bedrooms. If the house is modern built it has a bathroom. This is the class of houses that rent for about $700 a year.

What are called "tenant houses" rent much higher. They are built upon the principle of stowing the largest possible number into the least possible space. They are usually five stories high, and made to cover all the ground except a narrow space between the front and rear houses to admit light and let off steam. A house forty feet front, and fifty feet deep, would be divided into four family rooms upon each floor—each one having a room and bedroom, the latter in the center, without light or ventilation, and for which each family pays from $5 to $8 a month. This is a specimen of the better class of tenant houses; the poor ones, where large families live in single rooms, in garrets and cellars, pay a much higher rent—say $3 a month for an attic room ten feet square, or a dark dismal cellar, ten feet by twenty, $5 to $8 a month. Such a house as a respectable mechanic in the country would think necessary for his family of six persons would cost him $600 a year. If he took one floor of a house, with other families upon each of the other three floors, all using one common stairway, it would cost him $200.

Such are rents in New York. If our country friends think they look well, let them try them and be convinced to the contrary. [Trib.

Soiling-Animals.

The term, soiling, seems to be a misnomer; it means, as now used, the feeding of cattle in the stable with fresh grass cut daily for their use. It would seem from the derivation of the term, that turning out the animals to crop their food from the soil, would be a more congenial term—but it has been otherwise appropriated, has become technical, and so it must be used.

It has been incontestibly shown, that by the proper cultivation of the root crops, as much nutriment for animal subsistence can be obtained from an acre, as from the average product from fifteen acres of grass; and it would seem from the practice of soiling, now in extensive use in Europe, and more or less practiced in this country, that results and profits still more extraordinary are produced by this process. Rye grass is mostly preferred in the old country, which does not seem to succeed well in our climate of hot suns and arid atmosphere; but it is held that our clovers, which recover quick after clipping and from their long tap roots withstand the drouth, with a sprinkling of timothy, or some nutricious grass, produces a better article for that purpose, than any of the English grasses. Indian corn, sown broad-cast on a clean lay, or in narrow drills, has been used with great success.

Some of the reports of the results in soiling would not claim credibility in this country, did we not take into consideration the process followed of dressing with liquid manure; as it is self-evident that without some thorough and powerful feeding of the soil it would soon lose its capability of producing and become barren.

Animals turned into fresh pastures, destroy by bruising with the tread of their feet, as much as they eat. Tender herbage, and particularly clover, soon ferments and decomposes after being bruised, and is distasteful to the palates of cattle, which is one of the losses saved by soiling over promiscuous pasturage.

There appears to be no objection on the score of the health of animals, when kept in stalls for years—cows give more milk and of a richer consistency. It obviates fencing and saves a much greater quantity of manures and of a better quality, as it can be kept under cover, or in large piles. Soiling animals requires more labor, but not of a costly kind, as boys and old persons can perform all the duties required.

In very stony, hilly land, this process would not be applicable; but on good gravelly or loamy soils, in good heart for producing, it was the opinion and experience of the Hon. Josiah Quincy, of Mass., that one square rod of land was sufficient for a cow a day, which would be considered a very small pasture field for her to clip.

Mr. Kennedy, of Ayrshire, Scotland, kept last year 220 oxen, 460 sheep, 50 horses, and 150 store pigs, on 90 acres of rye grass. The year before, he fed on the same food, sheep at the rate of 56 head per acre for four months. They had a daily quantity of steamed food, what or how much is not stated, but they fattened rapidly, and he estimates, after a long experience, that by this process, at least four times as many animals can be sustained, and in better order, on the same land, as in the usual manner of field pasturing.

While land is as cheap, and individual farms as large as they now are, this process will not probably extensively prevail; but about those days that emigration is exhausted, (and that is a remote contingency,) and when public improvements gets the rot on the weevil, (not so remote a contingency,) and consumers turn producers, this course may be as common as turning cattle into the highway, or bush pastures are at present. Tea and Coffee.

A series of articles, entitled "The Narcotics we indulge in," have lately appeared in Blackwood's Magazine. They have been distinguished for great fairness and thorough knowledge of the aricles discussed, and have attracted no little attention among intelligent persons. Having been concluded in the December number, they have been followed, in that for January, by a paper on "The Beverages we indulge in," which mentions some interesting facts respecting tea and coffee, not generally known.

It must strike even the most careless mind as curious, that these beverages should have come into such general use for one common purpose, though originating in different parts of the globe, and though so totally opposite in appearance and character in their original condition. But when it comes to be known, through the analyzing processes of the chemist, that both tea and coffee, as infused beverages, contain substantially the same things, the astonishment increases. It is naturally asked how the rude nations, among whom these drinks first arose, discovered the chemical qualities of tea and coffee. The answer has never yet been made, and probably never will. We must, therefore, content ourselves with the fact itself.

The fact is undeniable. In three particulars, tea and coffee strikingly resemble each other. They are nearly all void of smell and taste in their natural state, and only acquire their peculiar flavor, or aroma, from a volatile oil produced in them during the processes of drying the leaf or roasting the berry. They all contain a peculiar, slightly bitter principle, very rich in nitrogen, which is called theine, and which has the property of lessening the natural wear and tear of the human body, and thus saving food to a certain extent. They all likewise hold in solution tartaric acid, the action of which on the system is not completely understood. In addition to these three substances, a considerable portion of gluten is contained in both tea and coffee; but owing to the leaves in one case not being drunk, nor the grounds in the other, this is wasted. In tea, the volatile oil evaporates with age, so that the older the tea is, the less intoxicating. To this volatile oil is owing the paralysis, which frequently attacks persons who have been, for several years, engaged in packing and unpacking teas. But on the contrary, the theine in coffee increases with the age of the berry. This substance, if taken in excess, accelerates the pulse, makes the heart beat quicker, produces trembling, excites the imagination, and predisposes to visions.

Coffee resembles tea in the effect which it produces, because it also contains theine, tartaric acid, and volatile oil. In coffee, however, they are combined in different proportions, and hence the reason why many persons prefer it as a beverage. The best coffee grows on the driest soils. Yet the worst coffee, if kept ten or fourteen years, will acquire the flavor of the finest Mocha. The principal art in preparing coffee lies in roasting, for in this process it is that its peculiar aroma is produced. The heat should never be greater than is sufficient to impart to the berry a light brown color; for if carried beyond this point, a disagreeable secondary smell mingles with the aroma. By the fashionable process of drinking coffee, that is without the grounds, a good deal of nutritious matter is wasted. A more uniformly strong, as well as agreeable infusion, it is thought, might be obtained by mixing a little soda with it; about forty grains of dry, or twice as much of crystalized carbonate of soda, to the pound of coffee, is the quantity recommended by Blackwood. Many of the Oriental nations drink the grounds invariably. Not less than a hundred millions of the human race drink coffee, it is computed, as a daily beverage. In France, Germany, Turkey, and a large portion of the United States, it is used by almost everybody, just as tea is in England, Holland, Russia, and China.

Tea and coffee become more indispensable as nations advance in intellectual activity. Whether this is a cause or effect, is not yet demonstrable, though the writer in Blackwood inclines to consider it the former. Perhaps the extraordinary popularity of these beverages, however, among the moderns, arises principally from the extension of commerce, and the consequent cheapness of tea and coffee. Experience teaches people that tea and coffee, used moderately, prevent the waste of the tissues, afford positive happiness, and increase the nervous activity, enabling men, as the writer in question forcibly remarks, "to show more blood and spirit in the face of difficulties."

With some persons, indeed, these beverages do not agree. But to the great mass of mankind, they are almost indispensable. "Besides the mere brick-work and marble, so to speak," says Blackwood, "by which the human body is built up and sustained, there are rarer forms of matter, it now appears, on which the life of the body and the comfort of animal existence most essentially depend." An important truth, and the one which really lies at the bottom of what has been called "the natural craving of mankind for stimulant." Perhaps, when truly broad views on this important subject come to prevail, it will be admitted everywhere that distilled liquors, if not wines, always have too much of this stimulating quality for the health of the body and mind, but that tea and coffee, when judiciously used, possess about the proper quantity. Medical News.

The medical and surgical profession figure largely in the recent issues of the patent office, nearly one half of the apparatus or instruments patented lately, relating to them, namely: Saliva pumps, diaphragm pumps, pill machines, tonsil instruments, amputating apparatus, and trusses.

An exchange paper advises one of its correspondents, who is afflicted with that loathsome disease, the leprosy, to apply friction, warm baths, sulphur baths, and afterwards slightly stimulating ointments, such as pitch ointment or weak citrine ointment, with light and moderate diet, and abstinence from wine and stimulants.

The United States Surgeon-General has made a report to Congress, from which it appears that the adulteration of drugs and medicines is carried on more extensively since the passage of the act of Congress to suppress the importation of such articles, than before; so that it is now alledged to be difficult to procure medicines which are not either mixed with some foreign substances, or from which some portion of the active principle has not been abstracted by chemical process.

Virginia furnishes three hundred medical students annually, and the whole South probably furnishes from 1,500 to 2,500.

Among the reforms in Turkey, induced by European influence, was that of quarantine. This occurred in 1839. In 1838 the plague had been worse in its ravages than for thirty years previously, and it was estimated that during the year 50,000 people died from it in Constantinople; and notwithstanding the quarantine worked badly at first, yet for fourteen years there had been hardly a case of the plague, and it has now ceased to be an epidemic.

The tables of mortality show that the average length of time persons who have attained to thirty years of age will live, is 34 years and 124 days; according to the experience of seventeen life insurance offices, 34 years and 156 days; according to the London Equitable Life Insurance Company, 34 years and 120 days.

Voltaire's definition of a physician is: "An unfortunate gentleman, expected every day to perform a miracle—namely, to reconcile health with intemperance." A better definition it would be impossible to give.

The Practical Dentist says that the great and all powerful destroyer of the human teeth is acid, vegetable or mineral, and it matters not whether that acid be formed in the mouth by the decomposition of particles of food left between and around the teeth, or whether it is applied directly to the organs themselves, the result is the same; the enamel is dissolved, corroded, and the tooth destroyed.

In some of the Eastern countries, one of the mother's earliest cares is to promote the growth of her children's eyelashes, by tipping and removing the fine gossamer-like points with a pair of scissors, when they are asleep. By repeating this every month or six weeks, they become in time, long, close, finely curved, and of a silky gloss. The practice never fails, and is very useful, when, owing to inflammation of the eyes, the lashes have been thinned and stinted.

A medical correspondent of Nelson's American Lancet, states that he has applied chloroform successfully in cases of neuralgia, tic doloreaux, tetanus, &c. In a case of tetanus he applied lint saturated with chloroform along the whole spine, and covered it with India-rubber cloth, which was attended with the best results. In cases of toothache, he has found a remedy in filling the cavity with cotton saturated with chloroform, and renewing it until the sensibility of the nerve was touched.

How Cincinnati became a City.

In the settlement of new countries, it often happens that the most trivial circumstances produce important results. According to Judge Burnet's "Notes on the North-Western Territory," the question whether North Bend or Cincinnati should be the great commercial town of the Miami country, was decided by the fact that the commandant of the military station at North Bend became strongly attached to a "black-eyed lady," who lived with her husband at the Bend, where he was stationed; and the husband becoming somewhat alarmed at the attentions which the commandant paid his wife, removed to Cincinnati. Finding his lady love had fled, the officer thought North Bend unfit for a commercial town, and moved with his troops to Cincinnati, and from that day the glory of the Bend departed, and that of Cincinnati arose. Judge Burnet remarks, (page 56:)—"The incomparable beauty of a Spartan dame produced a ten year's war, which terminated in the destruction of Troy; and the irresistable charms of another female transferred the commercial emporium of Ohio to the place where it now is. If the captivating American Helen had continued at the Bend, the garrison would have been erected there—population, capital, and business would have been centered there, and thence it would have been the Queen City of the West."

Washington at Monmouth.

David Leavitt, Esq., of Brooklyn, some time ago ordered of Mr. Leutze, the distinguished historical painter, a picture for which Washington at Monmouth had been chosen as the subject, the price of the work being fixed at $10,000. It is now finished and exposed. Leutze's picture is 21 feet by 13. It represents Washington in the rage into which he fell on that memorable occasion. General Lee had been sent out with a detachment of the American Army, to cut off and take an English baggage-train commanded by Gen. Clinton. Lee, without having fulfilled his orders, returns with his command in disorder, pursued by the enemy. Washington rushes with his staff to meet the retreating soldiers. His appearance alone stops them; he brings them to order under the fire of the enemy, and makes a stand. The composition represents the moment when Washington, on horseback, with sword in hand, utters the word "Halt!" to the retiring soldiers, and pours out his imprecations upon his disobedient subordinate. On the left of the picture, as we learn from a laudatory German criticism, is a body of soldiers already under the influence of Washington's command, and still more under that of the personality and the voice of the hero, their retrograde movement having almost ceased. As the battle took place on June 28, 1778, during the greatest heat of the season, the soldiers appear totally exhausted. In the foreground a man is lying on the ground trying to drink from a pool. Another is busy supporting a dying comrade. Notwithstanding these hardships, the troops are enthusiastic from the presence of Washington, although the cannon of the enemy rest menacingly on the surrounding hills. The aspect of the American soldiers is described as eminently imposing, with their variety of arms, costumes and ranks mixed up in a motley though artistic and picturesque combination. Rising from this chaos, we see the powerful individuality of Washington domineering the whole scene.

Motherly Affection.

Mary, Countess of Orkney, was deaf and dumb, and married in 1753, by signs. She lived with her husband, Murrough, first Marquis of Thomond, who was also her first cousin, at his seat, Rostellan, on the harbor of Cork. Shortly after the birth of her first child, the nurse, with considerable astonishment, saw the mother cautiously approach the cradle in which the infant was sleeping, evidently full of some deep design. She having perfectly assured herself that the child really slept, took out a large stone which she had concealed under her shawl, and to the horror of the nurse—who, like all persons of the lowest order in her country, indeed in most countries, was fully impressed with the idea of the peculiar cunning and malignity of "dumbies"—seized it with an intent to fling it down vehemently. Before the nurse could interpose, the countess had flung the stone—not, however, as the servant had apprehended, at the child, but on the floor. Of course it made a great noise. The child immediately awoke, and cried. The Countess, who had looked with maternal eagerness to the result of her experiment, fell on her knees in a transport of joy. She had discovered that her child possessed a sense that was wanting in herself. [Anecdotes of the Aristocracy.

MOUNT ÆTNA.—Prof. Silliman, in an account of Mount Ætna, thus describes a lava stream:—

At our feet was the wide black current of lava of 1669, so often mentioned, with its fifteen miles of length and three of breadth. From the cones on which we stood, this long tract of lava is visible, through its entire length quite to the sea. In its course it destroyed fifteen villages before it assailed Catania, at whose walls of sixty feet in height (erected on purpose to guard against such an assault) it halted for a brief space, like an invading army, then scaled the wall, and (to complete the simile) carried the town by assault. This lava current, in its whole length, is still black, bristling, and wave-like, as it was when first congealed, and decomposition is not even commenced. Not only the majestic dome, but all the groups of volcanoes, which on every side present themselves, especially in the direction towards the principal cone, have been, in their turn, eruptive, while innumerable currents of lava are in view, which have flowed from Ætna's sides.

CHIVALRY.—A correspondent of Die Reform, writes thus from Charleston, S. C., in illustration of the chivalrous and feudal spirit of the South:—

Last week two clerks were publicly whipped in the market place for stealing from their employers. They were sentenced to receive thirty-nine lashes, which were to be inflicted at three several times, and at such intervals, that the wounds caused by the first should be healed before the second punishment, and so of the third. At the first whipping, these unhappy victims of the barbarism of the middle ages, after suffering twenty strokes, fell bleeding and fainting, and were carried back to jail. Ten thousand persons beheld this horrible spectacle! I could tell you a dozen cases of this awful whipping, in which both men and women have been victims, but this one is sufficient. Nothing seems to me more disgraceful than that the best portion of the American Press, who were so indignant at Haynau, the "woman-whipper," should not have a word to say at the daily occurrences, disgraceful to humanity in their own land.

TRUE AND BEAUTIFUL.—George Hillard, of Boston, says: "I confess that increasing years bring with them an increasing respect for men who do not succeed in life, as those words are generally used. Heaven has been said to be a place for those who have not succeeded upon earth; and it is surely true that celestial graces do not best thrive and bloom in the hot blaze of worldly prosperity. Ill-success sometimes arises from a superabundance of qualities in themselves good—from a conscience too sensitive, a taste too fastidious, a self-forgetfulness too romantic, a modesty too retiring. I will not go so far as to say, with a living poet, that 'the world knows nothing of its greatest men,' but there are forms of greatness, or at least excellence, which 'die and make no sign;' there are martyrs that miss the palm, but not the stake; heroes without the laurel, and conquerors without the triumph."

ELOQUENT, BUT INARTICULATE.—A little while ago, we passed a half hour in a village grave-yard, reading the inscriptions on those Tables of Law of "dust to dust."

Upon one of them, carved in marble, was a chain. Of the nine links composing it one was broken.

How legible the characters! How intelligible the language! In that family there were nine once—a beautiful chain of affection, richer than gold; but Death had unloosed one link, and the broken jewelry of the hearth and the heart had glittered with the dews distilled from loving eyes.

Broken jewelry! How many such trinkets of memory and affection there are, in the homes of the world—souvenirs, whose possession should render humanity hallowed. Great grief makes sacred those upon whom its hand is laid. Joy may elevate, Ambition glorify, but Sorrow alone can consecrate.

Eight pupils have been expelled from Yates Academy, in Yates, N. Y., for attending a dancing school. They were residents of the village, and attended the dancing school under the direction of their parents. The Academy is sustained by State funds, and the citizens have held a meeting and adopted measures to test the legality of the expulsion.

LONDON LIQUOR-TRADE.—Rev. R. W. Vanderkiste, author of "A Six-Years' Mission among the Dens of London," is on the point of sailing for Sidney. In a letter to the Times, he says:

"London, according to the post-office directory, contained, in 1848, 2500 bakers, 990 buttermen and cheese-mongers, 1700 butchers, 3060 grocers and tea-dealers, 900 established dairy-keepers, 400 fishmongers, 1300 green-grocers and fruiterers; total, 10,700 and 11,000 public-houses. We may build churches and chapels, and multiply schools; but, sir, until the drunken habits of the lower orders are changed, we shall never act upon them as we would wish. While the pot-house is their church, gin their sacrament, and the tap-room their school-room for evening classes, how can we adequately act upon them for the conversion of their souls?"

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—The griddle on which cakes are baked should never be touched with grease. Firstly, because it imparts a rancid taste to the cakes. Secondly, if a cooking stove is used, it fills the whole house with the smell of burnt grease, betraying what we are going to have for breakfast. Wash the griddle with hot soapsuds, rub it well with a spoonful of fine salt and a coarse cloth; it will then be ready to receive the cakes. After each cake is removed, the salt rubbing must be repeated. Try it, and you will ever follow the advice of an old housekeeper.

VARIETY

Nebraska, about which we hear so much earnest discussion just now, is an imperial territory in extent. It embraces all that territory ceded by France to the United States, which yet remains unorganized under state or territorial government. It lies between Missouri, Iowa and Minnesota on the east, and the Rocky Mountains on the west. Its boundary is three thousand miles in length; its area five hundred thousand square miles; and it will form, it is stated, twelve states, each as large as Ohio.

The interior of Australia, a barren, sandy desert, has been found to be considerably below the level of the sea. It is now proposed to employ British convicts in cutting a narrow canal from the ocean to the desert, a distance of about 550 miles, when it is expected that the rush of water would be so great as to widen the canal and cause the formation of an inland sea almost as large as the Mediterranean, to the incalculable benefit of a vast extent of territory at present wholly useless.

A number of beet-root sugar manufactories in France have been turning their attention to the manufacture of spirits from the root. It appears that a very good champagne wine is made from beet-root. When the juice has been purified by the ordinary process, and a pure solution of sugar and water has been obtained, it is evaporated to a suitable density; after which, it is fermented by adding cream of tartar, and the required bouquet is given by means of aromatic plants.

At the chicken festival, Mr. Newett gave important facts in a short speech. In the State of New York the intrinsic value of fowls was not far from $2,500,000, and in the whole country about $15,000,000. The Shanghai fowl, of the compact make, he considered the most profitable generally. Among other remedies in cases of sickness, he suggested external applications of mixed turpentine and oil, and "internal purgatives" of bilious and blue pills, &c.

In Paris there are some twenty establishments where poor women, who go out to work by the day, leave their children in the charge of nurses, returning at proper times to suckle them, and taking them home at night. By this arrangement many poor women are able to get an honest livelihood who otherwise could do so only by painful neglect of their offspring. It is proposed to start similar institutions in this city, and $6,000 have already been pledged for the purpose.

By a new arrangement of car-wheels, they can be accommodated to railroads of different guages. The Cleveland Herald mentions the arrival in that city of a train of 11 cars, freighted with hogs, which were loaded at Indianapolis, and transported in the same cars from Indianapolis, and 54 miles over the 4 feet 8½ inch guage to Muncie, and thence 227 miles over a 4 feet and 10 inch guage to Cleveland.

The Home Journal, in an article upon editors, says:—Upon the whole, the Edior is a good fellow. He has his faults, like other men. But, generally speaking, he works hard and late, does a thousand obliging things, comes as near telling the truth as the people will let him, and, above all, he produces what the world could not exist without—The Newspaper."

The Prussians have put glass to a very novel use. A column, consisting entirely of glass, placed on the pedestal of Carrera marble, and surmounted by a statue of Peace, six feet high, by the celebrated sculptor Rauch, has been erected in the garden of the palace at Potsdam. The shaft is ornamented with spiral lines of blue and white.

The Russian emperor is described by those who have an opportunity of observing his movements, as living in a state of religious exaltation, regarding himself as the chosen instrument, under the hand of God, to drive the Moslem from Europe, and only regretting that he should have allowed so many years to pass by without fulfilling his destiny.

The Times and Transcript, of San Francisco, estimates the weekly cost of a daily paper at San Francisco, at $2,700, or $140,000 per annum. There are some twenty of these daily newspapers, and some ten weeklies; so that we may safely estimate the cost of San Francisco newspaper literature at $1,500,000 per annum.

It is said that one of the most distinguished physicians of New England ascribes the fearful increase of cases of paralysis to the use of stoves in close rooms, particularly in sleeping apartments.

Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant when they are incensed or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.

Patience is very good, but perseverance is much better; for while the former stands as a stoic under difficulties, the latter whips them out of the ring.

Alfred Cary, Esq., of Caryville, in Genesee county, has donated $20,000 to Cary Collegiate Seminary at that place.

HOMES FOR ALL.

Speech of Gerrit Smith on the Homestead Bill, delivered in the House of Representatives, Feb. 21, 1854.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I purpose to speak on the Homestead Bill. I choose this bill for the subject of my remarks, not only because it is "the special order," and is, therefore, entitled to preference, but because it is, in my judgment, second in importance to no bill, that has come, or that shall come, before us.

I am in favor of this bill. I do not say that there is not a line, nor a word, in it, that I would not have altered. But I do say, that I am in favor of the substance of it. I am in favor of the bill, not for the reason that, by giving up a part of the public lands to be occupied, the remainder will be more valuable to the Government than was the whole, before such occupation. Nor am I in favor of it, because the occupants will afford new subjects for taxation. Nor, in short, am I in favor of it for any of the current and popular reasons for it. But I am in favor of the bill, because I am in favor of what I interpret the bill essentially to be—let others interpret it, as they will. This bill, as I view it, is an acknowledgment, that the public lands belong, not to the Government, but to the landless.

Whilst I hope that the bill will prevail, I nevertheless can hardly hope, that a majority of the Committee will approve my reasons for it. Indeed, if the Committee shall so much as tolerate me, in putting forth these reasons, it is all I can expect, in the light of the fate of the land reform resolutions, which I offered in this Hall, the 16th January last.* The storm of indignation, which burst upon those resolutions, did, I confess, not a little surprise me. The angry words, which came sounding over into this part of the Hall, quite startled me. Even the reading of the resolutions by the Clerk was hardly borne with; and, no sooner had they been read, than, with hot haste, they were nailed to the table forever and ever.

And what are those resolutions, that they should have excited such displeasure? Why, their chief and controlling doctrine is, that men have a natural and equal right to the soil. And is this such a monstrous doctrine, as to make me guilty of a great offense—of an outrage on propriety—for offering the resolutions? It cannot be said, that they were expressed in indecent or profane language—in language offensive to purity or piety. Why, then, were they so treated? I am not at liberty to suppose, that it was from dislike to their author. It must be because their leading doctrine is so very wrong in the eyes of the honorable gentlemen around me. Now I am aware, that many of the doctrines, which I utter in this Hall, are very wrong in their eyes. But should they not remember, that their counter doctrines are no less wrong in my eyes? And yet, I appeal to all, whether I have ever evinced even the slightest impatience or unkindness under anything I have heard here?—and whether the equal footing, on which we find ourselves here, does not require, as well that patience and kindness should be accorded to me, as by me? However we may regard each other out of this Hall, certain it is, that, if, in this Hall, we do not regard each other as gentlemen entitled to mutual and perfect respect, we shall dishonor ourselves, and our constituency, and civil government itself.

I am sure, that no member of this body would have me disguise, or hold in abeyance, my real views on any subject under discussion. I am sure, that none of them would have me guilty of the self-degradation of affecting, and uttering, other views, and of studying an unprincipled accommodation of myself to the majority around me. I am sure, that none of them would have me consent to be

> "A pipe for fortune's finger,
> To sound what stop she please."

You would all have me be myself, and speak myself, however wrong myself may be. You would all have me to deal honestly and honorably with yourselves. But this I cannot do, unless I deal honestly and honorably with myself. If unfaithful to my own convictions, if false to myself, I shall, of necessity, be false to you; but if true to myself, I shall, of necessity, be true to you. To quote again from that great reader of the human heart from whom I had just quoted:

> "To thine own self be true;
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man."

I will say no more on this point than to add, that, God helping me, I shall earn the respect of every member of this body, by respecting myself.

And now, to my argument, and to my endeavor to show that land monopoly is wrong, and that civil government should neither practice, nor permit it; and that the duty of Congress is to yield up all the public land to actual settlers.

I admit, that there are things, in which a man can have absolute property, and which, without qualification or restriction, he can buy, or sell, or bequeath, at his pleasure. But, I deny, that the soil is among these things. What a man produces from the soil, he has an absolute right to. He may abuse the right. It nevertheless remains. But no such right can he have in the soil itself. If he could, he might monopolize it. If very rich, he might purchase a township or a county; and, in connection with half a dozen other monopolists, he might come to obtain all the lands of a state or a nation. Their occupants might be compelled to leave them and to starve; and the lands might be converted into parks and hunting-grounds, for the enjoyment of the aristocracy. Moreover, if this could be done, in the case of a state or a nation, why could it not be done in the case of the whole earth?

But it may be said, that a man might monopolize the fruits of the soil, and thus become as injurious to his fellow-men, as by monopolizing the soil itself. It is true, that he might, in this wise, produce a scarcity of food. But the calamity would be for a few months only, and it would serve to stimulate the sufferers to guard against its recurrence by a more faithful tillage, and by more caution in parting with their crops. Having the soil still in their hands, they would have the remedy still in their hands. But had they suffered the soil itself, to be monopolized; had they suffered the soil itself, instead of the fruits of it, to pass out of their hands; then they would be without remedy. Then they would lie at the mercy of him, who has it in his power to dictate the terms on which they may again have access to the soil, or who, in his heartless perverseness, might refuse its occupation on any terms whatever.

What I have here supposed in my argument is abundantly—alas! but too abundantly—justified by facts. Land monopoly has reduced no small share of the human family to abject and wretched dependence, for it has shut them out from the great source of subsistence, and frightfully increased the precariousness of life. Unhappy Ireland illustrates the great power of land monopoly for evil. The right to so much as a standing place on the earth is denied to the great mass of her people. Their great impartial Father has placed them on the earth; and, in placing them on it, has irresistibly implied their right to live of it. Nevertheless, land monopoly tells them, that they are trespassers, and treats them as trespassers. Even when most indulgent, land monopoly allows them nothing better than to pick up the crumbs of the barest existence; and, when, in his most rigorous moods, the monster compels them to starve and die by millions. Ireland—poor, land-monopoly-cursed and famine-wasted Ireland—has still a population of some six millions; and yet it is only six thousand persons, who have monopolized her soil. Scotland has some three millions of people; and three thousand is the number of the monopolists of her soil. England and Wales contain some eighteen millions of people, and the total number of those, who claim exclusive right to the soil of England and Wales, is thirty thousand. I may not be rightly informed, as to the numbers of the land monopolists in those countries; but whether they are twice as great, or half as great, as I have given them, is quite immaterial to the essence of my argument against land monopoly. I would say in this connection, that land monopoly, or the accumulation of the land in the hands of the few, has increased very rapidly in England. A couple of centuries ago, there were several times as many English land-holders, as there are now.

I need say no more to prove, that land monopoly is a very high crime, and that it is the imperative duty of Government to put a stop to it. Were the monopoly of the light and air practicable, and were the monopolists of these elements (having armed themselves with title deeds to them) to sally forth and threaten the people of one town with a vacuum, in case they are unwilling or unable to buy their supply of air; and threaten the people of another town with total darkness, in case they will not or cannot buy their supply of light; there, confessedly, would be no higher duty on Government than to put an end to such wicked and death-dealing monopolies. But these monopolies would not differ in principle from land monopoly; and they would be no more fatal to the enjoyments of human existence, and to human existence itself, than land monopoly has proved itself capable of being. Why land monopoly has not swept the earth of all good, is not because it is unadapted and inadequate to that end, but because it has been only partially carried out.

The right of a man to the soil, the light, and the air, is to so much of each of them, as he needs, and no more; and for so long as he lives, and no longer. In other words, this dear mother earth, with her never-failing nutritious bosom; and this life-preserving air, which floats around it; and this sweet light, which visits it, are all owned by each present generation, and are equally owned by all the members of such generation. Hence, whatever the papers or parchments regarding the soil, which we may pass between ourselves, they can have no legitimate power to impair the equal right to it, either of the persons, who compose this generation, or of the persons, who shall compose the next.

It is a very glaring assumption on the part of one generation to control the distribution and enjoyment of natural rights for another generation. We of the present generation have no more liberty to provide, that one person of the next generation shall have ten thousand acres and another but ten acres, than we have to provide, that one person of the next generation shall live a hundred years and another but a hundred days; and no more liberty to provide, that a person of the next generation shall be destitute of land, than that he shall be destitute of light or air. They, who compose a generation, are, so far as natural rights are concerned, absolutely entitled to a free and equal start in life; and that equality is not to be disturbed, and that freedom is not to be encumbered, by any arrangements of the preceding generation.

I have referred to the miseries, which land monopoly has brought upon the human family, and to the duty of the Government to put a stop to it. But how shall Government put a stop to it? I answer, by putting a stop to the traffic in land, and by denying to every person all right to more than his share of the land. In other words, the remedy for land monopoly is, that Government shall prescribe the largest quantity of land, which may be held by an individual; and shall, at distant periods, vary the quantity, according to the increase or diminution of the population. This maximum might, in our own country, where the population is so sparse, be carried as high as four or five hundred acres. Nevertheless, it might be necessary to reduce it one half, should our population be quadrupled. In a country, as densely peopled as Ireland, this maximum should, probably, not exceed thirty or forty acres.

What I have said concerning the land maximum obviously applies but to such tracts, as are fit for husbandry. To many tracts—to such, for instance, as are valuable only for mining or lumbering—it can have no application.

I may be asked, whether I would have the present acknowledged claims to land disturbed. I answer, that I would, where the needs of the people demand it. In Ireland, for instance, there is the most urgent necessity for overriding such claims, and subdividing the land anew. But, in our own country, there is an abundance of vacant and unappropriated land for the landless to go to. We ought not, however, to presume upon this abundance to delay abolishing land monopoly. The greediness of land monopolists might, in a single generation, convert this abundance into scarcity. Moreover, if we do not provide now for the peaceable equal distribution of the public lands, it may be too late to provide for it hereafter. Justice, so palpable and so necessary, cannot be withheld but at the risk of being grasped violently.

What I have said respecting the duty of Government to vary the land maximum at wide intervals, does, as I have already intimated, apply to our own country, as well as to other countries. The time may come, when, in this country, broad as it is, it will be necesary and just to disturb even the richest and most highly cultivated landed possessions. Should our population become so crowded, as to afford but fifty acres to a family, then the farm of a hundred acres, and that, too, however expensively every acre of it may be improved, must be divided into two equal parts; and the possessor of it, however old may be his possession, must be compelled to give up one of them to his landless brother. To deny the soundness of this conclusion, is to deny, not only the equality, but even the very fact, of the human brotherhood.

It is in the light of the possibility of such a division, that no man can sell his farm and convey it by a deed, which shall certainly carry title to it forever. I am willing to admit, that a man can sell or bequeath his farm, though, in strictness, it is but the betterments or improvements upon the soil, and not the soil itself, which he sells or bequeaths. But the purchaser or inheritor, and their successors, incur the hazard of having their possessions clipped by the new land maximum, which it may be the duty of Government to prescribe.

It is said, however, that all talk of land monopoly in America is impertinent and idle. It is boasted that, in escaping from primogeniture and entail, we have escaped from the evils of land monopoly. But the boast is unfounded. These evils already press heavily upon us; and they will press more and more heavily upon us, unless the root of them is extirpated—unless land monopoly is abolished. In the old portions of the country, the poor are oppressed and defrauded of an essential natural right by the accumulation of farms in the hands of wealthy families. In the new, the way of the poor, and indeed of the whole population, to comfort and prosperity is blocked up by tracts of wild land, which speculators retain for the unjust purpose of having them increase in value out of the toil expended upon the contiguous land. And why should we flatter ourselves that land monopoly, if suffered to live among us, will not, in time, get laws enacted for its extension and perpetuity, as effective even as primogeniture and entail? To let alone any great wrong, in the hope that it will never outgrow its present limits, is very unwise—very unsafe. But land monopoly is not only a great, but a mighty wrong; and, if let alone, it may stretch and fortify itself, until it has become invincible.

Much happier world will this be, when land monopoly shall cease; when his needed portion of the soil shall be accorded to every person; when it shall no more be bought and sold; when, like salvation, it shall be "without money and without price;" when, in a word, it shall be free, even as God made it free. Then, when the good time prophetically spoken of, shall have come, and "every man shall sit under his own vine and fig tree," the world will be much happier, because, in the first place, wealth will then be so much more equally distributed, and the rich and poor will then be so comparatively rare. Riches and poverty are both abnormal, false, unhappy states, and they will yet be declared to be sinful states. They beget each other. Over against the one is ever to be found a corresponding degree of the other. So long, then, as the masses are robbed by land monopoly, the world will be cursed with riches and poverty. But, when the poor man is put in possession of his portion of the goodly green earth, and is secured by the strong arm of Government in the enjoyment of a home, from which not he, nor his wife, nor his children, can be driven, then is he raised above poverty, not only by the possession of the soil, but still more by the virtues which he cultivates in his heart, whilst he cultivates the soil. Then, too, he no longer ministers to the undue accumulation of wealth by others, as he did when advantage was taken of his homeless condition, and he was compelled to serve for what he could get.

I would add in this place, that inasmuch as land monopoly is the chief cause of beggary, comparatively little beggary will remain after land monopoly is abolished. Where a nation is very badly governed in other respects, the abolition of land monopoly may be very far from resulting in the abolition of all beggary. And here let me say, that very little good can be promised from any reform to any people, who allow themselves to be oppressed and crushed by a national debt. France has done much toward abolishing land monopoly. But, because she is so much worse governed than England, she is, in the extent of her beggary, not very far behind England. I need not dwell upon, nor even describe the evils of beggary; and I need not say, that it is the duty of Government to put an end to it, so far as Government has the power and the right to do so. Beggary is an immeasurably great evil. It is such, not only because it is a burden upon the world, but far more, because it is a shame to the world—a shame to the beggar, and a shame to mankind.

I would, at this stage of my remarks, notice the cavil, that even if the equal ownership of the soil were practically acknowledged, nevertheless there would be persons who would get rich, and persons who would get poor. This would, doubtless, be true to a considerable extent; for, on the one hand, there are the provident, and on the other the improvident; on the one hand the cunning and crafty, and on the other the simple and unsuspecting. But because there will be rich and poor after the land is equally distributed, is that a reason why it should not be equally distributed? If, notwithstanding such equal distribution, there are persons, who will still be poor; if, notwithstanding Government restores to its subjects their natural right to the soil, some of them are incapable of rising above poverty; then is it all the more clearly proved, that Government was bound to mitigate their poverty by securing them homes. If, notwithstanding they are put in possession of their portions of the soil, they are still poor, alas, how much poorer would they have been without those portions! And again; if there are persons who get rich, notwithstanding they are not permitted to wield land monopoly in behalf of their ambition, then how manifestly important is it, that they were not allowed this means of getting richer?

In the next place, the world will be much happier when land monopoly shall cease, because manual labor will then be so honorable, because so well nigh universal.

It will be happier, too, because the wages system, with all its attendant degradation and unhappy influences, will find but little room in the new and radically changed condition of society, which will follow the abolition of land monopoly. Then, as a general thing, each man will do his own work, and each woman hers; and this too, not from choice only, but from necessity also; for then, few will be wealthy enough to be able to hire, and few poor enough to consent to serve.

It will be happier too, because of the general equality there will then be, not in property only, but in education, and other essential respects also. How much fewer the instances then, than now, of a haughty spirit on the one hand, and an abject spirit on the other! The pride of superior circumstances, so common now, (though happily far from universal) in the condition of dependent poverty; and the difficulty of overcoming which is so well compared to the difficulty of making an empty bag stand up straight!

Again, the world will be happier when land monopoly is abolished, because it will more abound in marriage. Marriage, when invited by a free soil, will be much more common and early, than when, as now, it must be delayed, until the parties to it are able to purchase a home.

Another gain to the world from abolishing land monopoly, is that war would then be well nigh impossible. It would be so, if only because it would be difficult to enlist men into its ranks. For who would leave the comforts and endearments of home, to enter upon the poorly-paid and unhonored services of a private soldier? It was not "young Fortinbras" only, who, in collecting his army,

> "Shark'd up a list of landless resolutes."

But, in every age and country, war has found its recruits among the homeless—among vagabonds.

And still another benefit to flow from the abolition of land monopoly is its happy influence upon the cause of temperance—that precious cause, which both the great and the small are, in their folly and madness, so wont to scorn, but which is, nevertheless, none the less essential to private happiness and prosperity, to national growth and glory. The ranks of intemperance, like those of war, are, to a great extent, recruited from the homeless and the vagrant.

I will glance at but one more of the good effects that will result from the abolition of land monopoly. Religion will rejoice, when the masses, now robbed of homes by land monopoly, shall have homes to thank God for—homes, in which to cultivate the home-bred virtues, to feed upon religious truth, and to grow in Christian vigor and beauty.

How numerous and precious the blessings, that would follow the abolition of land monopoly! By the number and preciousness of those blessings, I might entreat civil government, the earth over, to abolish it. But I will not. I prefer to demand this justice in the name of justice. In the name of justice, I demand, that civil government, wherever guilty of it, shall cease to sell and give away land—shall cease to sell and give away what is not its own. The vacant land belongs to all who need it. It belongs to the landless of every clime and condition. The extent of the legitimate concern of Government with it is but to regulate and protect its occupation. In the name of justice do I demand of Government not only that it shall itself cease from the land traffic, but that it shall compel its subjects to cease from it. Government owes protection to its subjects. It owes them nothing else. But that people are emphatically unprotected, who are left by their Government to be the prey of land monopoly.

The Federal Government has sinned greatly against human rights in usurping the ownership of a large share of the American soil. It can, of course, enact no laws, and exert no influence, against land monopoly, whilst it is itself the mammoth monopolist of land. This Government has presumed to sell millions of acres, and to give away millions of acres. It has lavished land on States, and corporations, and individuals, as if it were itself the Great Maker of the land. Our State Governments, also, have been guilty of assuming to own the soil. They, too, need repent. And they will repent, if the Federal Government will lead the way. Let this Government distinctly disclaim all ownership of the soil; and, everywhere within its jurisdiction, let it forbid land monopoly, and prescribe the maximum quantity of land, which an individual may possess, and the State Governments will not fail to be won by so good and so attractive an example. And if the Governments of this great nation shall acknowledge the right of every man to a spot of earth for a home, may we not hope that the Governments of many other nations will speedily do likewise? Nay, may we not, in that case, regard the age as not distant, when land monopoly, which numbers far more victims than any other evil, and which is, moreover, the most prolific parent of evil, shall disappear from the whole earth, and shall leave the whole earth to illustrate, as it never can, whilst under the curse of land monopoly, the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man?

But will this Government take this step, which we have now called on it to take? Will it go forward in this work of truth and love? Will it have a part, and the most honorable part, in bringing all this blessedness and glory upon the human family? A more important question has never been addressed to it; and the passing of this bill will be the most significant and satisfactory answer which this question could now receive. Let this bill become a law, and, if our Government shall be consistent with itself, land monopoly will surely cease within the limits of the exclusive jurisdiction of that Government. But let this bill be defeated, and let success attend the applications for scores of millions of acres for soldiers, and for hundreds of millions of acres for railroad and canal companies, and land monopoly will then be so strongly fastened upon this nation, that violence alone will be able to throw it off. The best hope for the poor will then perish. The most cherished reliance for human progress will then be trodden under foot.

Let it not be supposed, that I would not have the soldier liberally paid. No man would go further than myself in rewarding the armed servant of the Republic. But I would not have the poor robbed;—I would not have a high crime committed against humanity;—even for the sake of doing justice to the soldier. Indeed, justice can never be done by injustice.

Whatever is due to the soldier should be paid—paid promptly—and paid, too, with large interest. But let it be paid in money. And, I would here say, that a little money would be worth more to the soldier than much land. If the land market is to be glutted, as is now proposed, his land will be worth but little to him. It will not sell, at the present time. And with him and his necessitous family, the present time is emphatically all time. They cannot wait, as can the speculator, until the land shall become saleable.

My reference to the speculator affords me an occassion for saying that, not only the lands which you let soldiers have, but also the lands which you let railroad companies and canal companies have, will get into the hands of land speculators. That is their sure and speedy destination; and it is in those hands, that land monopoly works its mightiest mischief, and develops its guiltiest character.

Nor let it be supposed, that there is no railroad and no canal that I would have Government aid in building. Wherever it can be plead in behalf of the proposed canal or railroad, that it cannot be built without the aid of Government; and that the building of it will furnish Government with an indispensable, or at least, very important means for extending that protection which is ever due from Government; there, I admit, is a case in which Government is bound to aid. Hence is it, that whilst, on the one hand, I pronounce it to be a gross perversion of its powers, and a wide and guilty departure from its province, for Government to help build canals and railroads, which are to subserve but the ordinary purposes of commerce and travel; I hold, on the other, that Government is bound to offer a liberal, though not an extravagant sum to the company, that shall build the Pacific Railroad—that road being greatly needed as a facility for affording Governmental protection. Hence is it, too, that the claim on Government to help build the canal around the Falls of St. Mary was a just one. And for the like reason should Government aid in building the proposed canal around the Falls of Niagara. It is true, that the commercial interests of many of our States call loudly for the building of this canal. Indeed, there is no one thing for which they call so loudly. Nevertheless, I would not, for that reason, have Government respond to the call. But because this canal might prove an important means in the hands of Government of affording that protection which it owes to the persons and property of its subjects, I should feel bound to vote the liberal aid of Government in building it. Moreover, Government would be grossly inconsistent, if, so long as it looks to the possibility of war, it should refuse to vote two or three millions of dollars to the company that might thereby be induced to furnish Government with this means of transporting its vessels, munitions, and provisions of war, between Lakes Erie and Ontario.

* Whereas, all the members of the human family, notwithstanding all contrary enactments and arrangements, have, at all times, and in all circumstances, as equal a right to the soil as to the light and air, because as equal a natural need of the one as of the other: And whereas, this invariably equal right to the soil leaves no room to buy, or sell, or give it away; Therefore,

1. Resolved, That no bill or proposition should find any favor with Congress, which implies the right of Congress to dispose of the public lands, or any part of them, either by sale or gift.

2. Resolved, That the duty of civil government in regard to public lands, and indeed to all lands, is but to regulate the occupation of them; and that this regulation should ever proceed upon the principle, that the right of all persons to the soil—to the great source of human subsistence—is as equal, as inherent, and as sacred, as the right to life itself.

3. Resolved, That Government will have done but little toward securing the equal right to land, until it shall have made essential to the validity of every claim to land both the fact, that it is actually possessed, and the fact, that it does not exceed in quantity the maximum, which it is the duty of Government to prescribe.

4. Resolved, That it is not because land monopoly is the most efficient cause of inordinate and tyrannical riches on the one hand, and of dependent and abject poverty on the other; and that it is not because it is, therefore, the most efficient cause of that inequality of condition, so well nigh fatal to the spread of democracy and Christianity, that Government is called upon to abolish it; but it is because the right, which this mighty agent of evil violates and tramples under foot, is among those clear, certain, essential, natural rights, which it is the province of Government to protect, at all hazards, and irrespective of all consequences.

One winter's evening, while the family were, as usual, gathered round the centre table, a neighbor drove up, and entering soon with hearty friendliness, had Kitty on his knee. "Come, Kitty," said he, "won't you go home and live with me?" The child looked up into his face; the golden curls fell backwards to her shoulders, and her deep blue eyes met his, as she answered, "God gave to me this home."

THE DIAMOND RING.

Translated for the Parlor Magazine, from the German of Lichwehr, by Rev. E. H. Gillett.

An aged sire, upon whose head
The snows of many years were shed,
Blessed with large wealth, would yet bestow
A prize that wealth should far outgo
On his three sons, his fortune's heirs—
A prize more worthy of their prayers.
He knew no wealth was worth a thought,
Save that by virtuous action wrought.

"My sons," he said, "my wealth is yours—
A dangerous wealth, to snares that lures;
But heed my words, and what ye crave,
A father's blessing, ye shall have.
Within my hands a ring I hold,
A diamond ring of worth untold;
To him of you shall it be given
Who does the noblest deed for Heaven.
More precious than the golden ring
Will be the deed that back ye bring."

The sons went forth, each bent to gain
A price no monarch might disdain.
Months passed; each from his mission came,
Each to present his several claim.

The eldest spake: "O Father, mine
Is justly now that ring of thine.
A stranger gave to me in trust
His precious pile of golden dust,
Without a pledge of its return;
I gave it back—the prize I earn."

"Ah no! my son, the deed was just,
But Duty bids return thy trust."
The second spake: "I saw a child,
Heedless of danger, reckless, wild,
Fall in the sea—I rushed to save,
And snatch it from a watery grave.
I risked my life. A thousand eyes
Beheld the deed that wins the prize'

"Ah no! my son," the old man said:
"Although your deed was kindly sped,
You only did to virtue true
What we as men are bound to do."
The third one came: "I saw," he said,
"My foe asleep where dangers dread
Yawned in the gaping gulf beneath;
I waked, and drew him back from death."

'Well done, my son! the prize is thine.
The deed was noble, 't was divine!"

DEATH-BED OF WASHINGTON.

The following interesting account of the last hours of Washington, we copy from the New York Courier and Enquirer:—

Proceeding still further over a very bad road, we came suddenly in view of the Potomac; and Mount Vernon, with its mansion-house and smooth, green lawn, was before us. Having sent in our address, we receive permission from the courteous branch of the family, who now held the estate, to enter and survey the interior. We were struck with its extreme simplicity, the lowness of the walls and ceilings, and the bare floors which were waxed, not, as with us, carpeted.

Passing through the great hall, ornamented with pictures of English hunting scenes, we ascended the oaken staircase, with its carved and antique balustrade; we stood at the door—we pressed the handle—the room, and the bed where he died, were before us. Nothing in the lofty drama of his existence surpassed the grandeur of that final scene. The cold which he had taken from exposure, in overseeing some part of his grounds, and which had resisted the earlier domestic remedies that were applied, advanced in the course of two short days into that frightful form of the disease of the throat, laryngitis. It became necessary for him to take to his bed. His valued friend, Dr. Cralk, was instantly summoned, and assisted by the best medical skill of the surrounding country, exhausted all the means of his art, but without affording him relief. He patiently submitted, though in great distress, to the various remedies proposed, but it became evident from the deep gloom settling upon the countenances of the medical gentlemen, that the case was hopeless; advancing insidiously, the disease had fastened itself with deadly certainty. Looking with perfect calmness upon the sobbing group around him, he said, "Grieve not, my friends; it is as I anticipated from the first; the debt which we all owe is now about to be paid. I am resigned to the event." Requesting Mrs. Washington to bring two wills from his escritoir, he directed one to be burned, and placed the other in her hands, as his last testament, and then gave some final instructions to Mr. Lear, his secretary and relative, as to the adjustment of his business affairs. He soon after became greatly distressed; and as, in the paroxysms which became more frequent and violent, Mr. Lear, who was at his side, assisted him to turn, he, with kindness, but with difficulty, articulated, "I fear I give you great trouble, sir; but, perhaps it is a duty which we all owe one to another. I trust that you may receive the same attention when you shall require it."

As the night waned, the fatal symptoms became more imminent; his breath more labored and suffocating, and his voice soon failed him. Perceiving his end approaching, he straightened himself to his full length; he folded his own hands in the necessary attitude upon his chest, placing his finger upon the pulse of the left wrist, and thus calmly prepared, watching his own dissolution, he awaited the summons of his Maker. The last faint hope of his friends had disappeared; Mrs. Washington, stupefied with grief, sat at the foot of the bed, her eyes fixed steadfastly upon him; Dr. Cralk, in deep gloom, stood with his face buried in his hands at the fire; his black servant, Christopher, the tears uncontrolled, trickling down his face, on one side, took the last look of his dying master; while Mr. Lear, in speechless grief, with folded hands, bent over his pillow on the other.

Naught broke the stillness of his last moments, but the suppressed sobs of the affectionate servants collected on the staircase; the tick of the large clock in the hall as it measured off, with painful distinctness, the last fleeting moments of his existence, and the low moan of winter wind, as it swept through the leafless snow-covered trees. The laboring and wearied spirit drew nearer to its goal; the blood languidly coursed slower and more slowly through its channels; the noble heart stopped, struggled, stopped, fluttered; the right hand slowly slid from the wrist, upon which its finger had been placed; it fell at the side; and the manly effigy of Washington was all that remained extended upon the death-couch!

SABBATH-BREAKING PARTNERSHIPS.

According to Sabbatarian theology, the keeping of the first day of the week is sin. We hold it to be sin, not because we are wanting in charity towards our first-day brethren, but because it involves a transgression of that law which says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath; in it thou shalt not do any work." It is sin because, being a human tradition, it makes void the commandment of God. This is the doctrine we have proclaimed to the world. We are continuing to proclaim it, in our public discourses, in our tracts, and in all our ecclesiastical movements. We are aiming to impress it on our fellow disciples of all persuasions, that, in keeping the first day of the week, they are symbolizing with Popery, honoring a human tradition, and transgressing the divine law. This is what we are aiming at by our restricted communion; this is the object of our church organizations. For so important does this thing appear to us, that we cannot unite in commemorating the Lord's death with those who keep the Sunday, lest we should fail to bear that emphatic testimony against their practice, which we think it our duty to bear.

But when copartnerships are concerned, our brethren manifest a surprising reluctance about bearing such testimony. The Sabbath-keeper cannot say to his Sunday partner, 'This keeping open of our establishment on the Sabbath-day, and having work done all the day long, is a transgression of the divine law.' He feels himself bound to keep silence here. His partner would retort upon him with, 'Why, then, do you partake in the sin?' And he knows, that if he should give an honest answer, he would say, 'Because I hope to gain by it.' But is gain godliness?

Two persons enter into business, and the condition of partnership is, that intoxicating liquors shall be sold in their establishment. One of these scruples the lawfulness of such traffic, and declares that his conscience will not allow him to deal out alcohol to his neighbor. 'O,' says the other, 'the matter is easily remedied. I will attend to that part of the business myself; I will wait on every customer; you need never draw a measure of rum for any body; all you need do, is to attend to such business of the store as you can, without violating your conscience; for my part, I am troubled with no such scruples; I consider the selling of rum a lawful and honest business.' For the sake of gain he yields; he puts his proportion of the avails of the abominable traffic in his pocket, grows rich, and gives himself no farther trouble. But is he not quite as guilty as his rum-selling partner?

Now, if the principle of what we call Sabbath-breaking partnerships is any thing different, we would like to know wherein. It is true, in the eyes of community, the keeping of Sunday is as odious a practice as the selling of rum. The moral sense of community is awake to the iniquity of the latter, and almost every body is ready to condemn the man who will deal out liquid poison to his neighbors, and yet pretend to be a Christian. But principles are not affected by men's views. The immorality of the rum traffic is anterior to any view of it whatever. The immorality of it was as great fifty years ago, when the tavern keeper was a good church member, and the minister and the deacon took a social glass together, as it is now. The slave-trade, too, was as abominable in the sight of God, when good John Newton, of Olney, was engaged in it, as it is in the sight of men now. Sunday-keeping is now honorable. But though it is so with men, is it so in the sight of God? Is it not sin? If it is sin, it is odious to God, and ought to be so to men.

'But you do not mean to say, that Sunday-keeping is a sin of the same odious and abominable nature with the rum-traffic, or the slave-trade?' This is a question which we are not called to decide. Neither are we called to say whether the keeping of Sunday may not be consistent with a true experience of the love of God shed abroad in the heart. It is enough for us to know that the thing involves transgression of the divine law. We are forbidden to be partakers of other men's sins. Sin is sin, not because it is an offense against human society, but because it is a trampling upon God's authority. As an offense against society, or as a wrong inflicted upon our fellow creatures, the slave trade or rum selling may be infinitely worse than the repudiation of the Bible Sabbath. And because this is the rule by which the turpitude of moral actions is, for the most part, measured, any business which involves murder, oppression, robbery, or the like, is easily seen to be a business in which Christians ought to have no participation; while a business which involves nothing but violation of the Sabbath, because it appears to imply no injustice to man, is viewed as lawful for all. It is very plain, that God's authority is thus left out of the question.

We teach, that sin is a dangerous thing; that the wages of it is death; that it is to be repented of, and forsaken; that there is no salvation from it but by the blood of Atonement. What, then, must be the thoughts of the Sunday keeping partner, as his associate, when the sixth day of the week is drawing to a close, says to him substantially as follows:—'To-morrow is the Sabbath; it is unlawful to do any work; I must, therefore, keep the day holy, and not bring sin upon my soul. But here is a piece of work that Mr. A. will call for to-morrow morning; I hope you will wait on him, and receive the pay. Here is another piece that is to be finished for Mr. B. in the afternoon. Set all hands to work, and let it not fail to be done by the time appointed. Send John to the next village to collect what is due us, and tell Peter to keep all hands in his department busy.' His partner listens to the request. Clerks, servants, and agents of every description, stand by and hear it all. The sun goes down, and the Sabbath-keeper goes home. Partner, and clerks, and all, begin to say within themselves, if not audibly to one another, 'Strange sort of Christian that! He tells us that our practice of working here on the Sabbath is a transgression of the divine law—that it is sin. He says, too, that sin is dangerous—that the wages of it is death. He professes, sometimes, to be deeply concerned about those that are living in sin. Not long ago we heard him praying with great apparent earnestness that God would have mercy upon sinners, and deliver them from their awful danger. Yet now he gives us direct and explicit charge to do that which he says is sin. He fully expects us to do it, and will be disappointed if we do not. Is he a true man? Does he really believe what he professes?' Reader, what is the moral influence of such Sabbath-keepers? T. B. B.

EMBARKATION AND SAILING OF OUR MISSIONARIES.

At half past 2 o'clock on Fourth-day morning, March 8th, our missionaries, accompanied by eight or ten brethren and sisters, left Westerly for Boston, where they arrived about half past 6 A. M., having previously learned that the barque Rose Pool, in which they had taken passage, would sail on the morning of the 8th. But in consequence of stormy weather, the lading of the ship was retarded, and consequently the time of sailing was delayed until six o'clock Sabbath morning, the 11th inst.

On Fifth-day morning, about half past 11 o'clock, agreeable to arrangements made on the previous day, the embarkation services were held on the deck of the ship, about one hour previous to her leaving her station at Rowe's Wharf for her anchorage in the harbor. The services, which occupied about thirty or forty minutes, were as follows: After singing the hymn commencing with the words,

"A charge to keep I have," prayer was offered by Eld. C. M. Lewis; after which Eld. Hiram Hutchins, pastor of the High-st. Baptist church in Charlestown, Mass., made some interesting remarks, and offered prayer; then followed brief remarks by Eld. W. M. Jones and Eld. A. B. Burdick, and prayer by Eld. Burdick. At sister Saunders' request, we sung a part of the hymn commencing—

"Yes, my native land, I love thee;
All thy scenes, I love them well;"

after which Eld. Isaac P. Langworthy, of Chelsea, Mass., made a few interesting and appropriate remarks, with which the services closed.

During these exercises, quite a large number of persons assembled on the wharf and on the ship's deck, and witnessed the solemn services. This was a season of thrilling interest and many hearts felt that the approving Spirit was present—that Jesus was in our midst. The missionaries remained on board the ship for the most of the time until she sailed.

About eight o'clock on Sixth-day evening, the master of the ship (Capt. J. C. Harding) informed us that there would be a change in the weather about midnight, and that the wind would be to the westward on the morrow, and that all hands belonging to the vessel must remain on board, as they would probably sail some time during the latter part of the night. I soon after bid them "good night," and started for the shore, promising them that if I saw the ship at anchor in the morning, I would come off to them—a thing hardly to be expected, in view of the announcement of the scientific captain. Still, the possibility that we might greet each other again in the morning somewhat mitigated the anguish of the farewell. As I turned from them, and hastened down the sides of the ship, a female voice followed me from the cabin, saying: "Pray for us, dear brother, that God may be with us, and prosper us in our way." And another voice followed quickly after, from her who to the writer is doubly a sister, saying, "We shall meet again, if not in this, in a better world; let us be faithful to our God." And as the oars of the boatmen, who had become almost impatient of my lingering, darted me swiftly towards the shore, a brother's voice is heard on the deck, in a subdued yet firm strain, saying, "Farewell! Our motto is, 'Trust in the Lord!' Farewell—the Lord go with you." The boat sped on; and as I watched the fading forms of the loved ones who still kept their places on the deck, thinking that I had probably listened to the last notes that I should ever hear from their lips, still another voice, more accustomed to rehearsing the sacred text than the others, sounded out, trumpet-like, on the evening air, in accents of triumph: "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; but none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." Thus we parted. The next morning at 7 o'clock I visited the wharf; the Rose Pool had started on her voyage.

On reaching home I found a number of brief letters, hastily sketched by them while the pilot was still with them, which he brought on shore; from which I take the following extracts, which may indicate the feelings of our beloved missionaries when actually on their way to their future home and field of labor.

BOSTON HARBOR,
Barque Rose Pool, March 10.

DEAR BROTHER A.—It is now near 10 P. M., and every thing is in a whirl in the cabin, and amidst the bustle I sit down to scribble a few lines. . . . When you left the ship, I felt that our last friend that we are to leave behind had gone, and one of our best and dearest on earth. I watched the boat until she was lost in the distance, and when my natural vision failed, my prayers reached still onward. C. S.

March 11.—Good morning, brother—a fine Sabbath. Our slumbers were broken in upon by the sailors' merry song while weighing anchor, about six o'clock in the morning. The ship is now under way, and my feelings I cannot describe. . . . I must close to send this by the pilot. Trust in God and be faithful, and I trust that we shall meet again; farewell, farewell! C. SAUNDERS.

BOSTON HARBOR,
Sabbath morning, March 11.

MY VERY DEAR BROTHER A.—The ship has weighed anchor, and we have been watching the shores of our native land, the homes of our loved ones which we are now leaving. May God's richest blessings ever attend you. It is hard to leave you. My Saviour, I do this for THEE. Farewell! MARTHA.

BARQUE ROSE POOL, 11th 3d mo., 1854,
Half past 7 A. M.—Sabbath.

DEAR BROTHER.—We are now under way, sailing out of Boston Harbor, about four knots; we have a fair wind, but some fog yet in the horizon. The pilot will leave us in about an hour. It is only this very extraordinary occasion which leads me to write on the Sabbath. I will defer writing you my feelings and many thoughts until another time. For your kindness, and the kindness of all our little company who left us yesterday and the day before, I thank you, and pray God to return a thousand fold into your bosoms.

O, dear brother, pray for us. Be assured, we feel the cheering presence of our Lord and Master, who has said, "Lo, I am with you." Nine years ago the 10th of 1st month, we were sailing this channel, near the same hour of the day. That was our first voyage at sea. This is the seventh by my family, and the ninth by myself. God has hitherto wonderfully preserved us, and why should we not feel to trust him the more? Again I would say, Pray for us, that "faith, hope and charity" may characterize all our efforts. And may all the brethren be filled with holy zeal for the Lord of Hosts.

Your brother in Christ, W. M. JONES.

"AND THE SEVENTH ANGEL SOUNDED."

Rev. 11 : 15.

This is the last of a series of seven trumpets given to seven angels, (Rev. 8 : 2,) and closes a series of events covering several centuries. "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." Rev. 10 : 7. What a startling announcement! Yet many persons see nothing startling—perhaps anticipate a glorious change for all mankind—that wars shall cease, and peace cover the earth—that the sounding of this trumpet brings one of the greatest blessings this world ever enjoyed, even that time when it shall be said, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ"—that it brings the expected millennium, when the influence of the gospel of Christ shall be universally felt and acknowledged, and he shall reign in the hearts of all, or nearly all, mankind. What say the Scriptures? We appeal to them.

That these trumpets, except the seventh, are trumpets of bloodshed and death, is, I believe, generally admitted. I believe it is also admitted, that six have already sounded—the first commencing about A. D. 377, under Alaric; the second, about A. D. 439, under Genseric; the third, about A. D. 451, under Attilla; the fourth, about A. D. 476, under Odoacer. Under this last, or fourth, "an angel flying through the midst of heaven" proclaimed "with a loud voice, Wo, wo, wo, to the inhabiters of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels which are yet to sound." (Ch. 8 : 13.) The fifth and sixth had their sounding in Mahommedan times, and are in the past. Bear in mind, these last three are specially called wo trumpets. Under the sounding of the fifth, death was preferable to the troubles and distresses which had to be endured. At the close of the sounding of the fifth trumpet, it is said, "One wo is past, behold there come two woes more hereafter." The sixth trumpet sounds, and war drenches with blood a portion of the earth, and they who "were not killed by these plagues repented not of the works of their hands," but rather increased in wickedness. Many interesting occurrences transpire under the sounding of this trumpet, which I must necessarily pass over for the present, and come to the conclusion of its sounding, when it is said, "The second wo is past, behold the third wo cometh quickly." The certainty of the seventh trumpet being a wo trumpet, should lead us to look carefully to what is predicted shall transpire under its sounding. Expressions of hope are continually saluting our ears, that the world is to be converted to Christ, because it is said that the kingdoms of this world are become His, "and He shall reign forever and ever." When they become his, what does he do with them? "As the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers," (Rev. 2 : 27.) Ps. 2 : 9—"Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Dan. 2 : 44—"And in the days of these kings the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people; it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

What occurs under the sounding of the seventh angel? "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom (not kingdoms) of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever," (v. 15.) "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give re[illegible]d unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldest destroy them which destroy (corrupt) the earth," (v. 18) Is not this the fulfillment of the prophecies which I have quoted? If it had been declared the nations were converted, instead of "the nations were angry," it would then have agreed with the prevailing sentiment among most Christians of the present day. Again, if conversion were a particular work under the seventh trumpet, I think it would have been so expressed, instead of "thy wrath is come." God has employed human agencies in carrying forward and accomplishing his designs towards his creature man, but the time will come for those agencies to cease.

The time is at hand when the seventh trumpet will sound; and as the six trumpets are in the past, and the time after the sounding of the sixth to the beginning of the sounding of the seventh is called "quickly," it is probably very near. Are not the nations beginning to be angry, and will not the wo fall on them? Those that have the seal of God on them are safe, but "the inhabiters of the earth," who have their "treasure" here, whose "affections" are "on things on the earth," who "destroy (corrupt) the earth," how appalling the sounding of this trumpet—the last of the series—in fact, the last trumpet—when Paul says, "We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and the dead shall be raised," (1 Cor, 51 : 52)—when the Lord "shall send his angels, with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other"—when the Lord himself shall come, as Paul says, (1 Thess. 4 : 16,) "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise"—when Jesus shall be crowned "King of kings and Lord of lords." Rev. 19 : 12, 16. Appalling indeed to all but "his elect," when "the heavens depart as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island are moved out of their places; when the kings of the earth and the great men and the rich men and the chief captains and the mighty men and every bondsman and every freeman hide themselves in dens and in the rocks of the mountains, and say to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand." Rev. 6 : 14—17. That trumpet and voice which once "shook the earth," (on Sinai, Ex. 19 : 16, 19,) and "will once more shake not the earth only, but heaven also," (Heb. 12 : 26,) "I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea and the dry land, and I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come," (Hag. 2 : 7)—also Joel 3 : 10, "The Lord shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake"—that trumpet is about to sound! It is the next to sound; it is the last! It is a wo trumpet. A wo indeed, when "the mystery of God is finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." J. C.

THE CLERGY BEFORE THE SENATE.

In the Senate of the United States, on the 14th inst., no small stir was created by the presentation of the mammoth memorial or protest against the passage of the Nebraska Bill, signed by three thousand New England clergymen. It was presented by Edward Everett, and read as follows:—

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Represenatives of the United States in Congress assembled:—

"The undersigned clergymen of different religious denominations in New England, hereby, in the name of the Almighty God, and in His presence, do solemnly protest against the passage of what is known as the Nebraska bill, or any repeal or modification of the existing legal prohibitions against slavery in that part of our national domain which it is proposed to organize into the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. We protest against it as a great moral wrong, as a breach of faith eminently injurious to the moral principles of the community, and subversive of all confidence in national engagements, as a measure full of danger to the peace, and even existence, of our beloved Union, and exposing us to the righteous judgments of the Almighty—and your protestants, as in duty bound, will ever pray. Dated at Boston this 1st day of March, A. D., 1854."

No sooner had this document been read, than Mr. Douglas (father of the Nebraska bill) took the floor and made a violent speech against the petitioners. He was followed by Mr. Houston in justification of their course; by Messrs. Butler, Mason, Adams of Mississippi, Weller of California, and Pettit of Indiana, in condemnation of it; by Mr. Everett in explanation of his course in presenting the memorial; and by Mr. Seward in defense of the right of petition. The gist of the matter will be learned from the following abstract of the remarks of the principal speakers:—

MR. DOUGLAS said his only object was to call the attention of the Senate to the memorial. It is presented after the action of the Senate, as a protest against our action, against the action in which certainly two thirds of this body concurred. It protests against our action as being a breach of faith, as involving a moral wrong, as destructive of all confidence, and as subjecting us to the righteous judgment of the Almighty. It is presented, too, by a denomination of men calling themselves "preachers of the Gospel." It has been demonstrated in debate, that there is not a particle of truth in the allegations of a breach of faith or breach of confidence. It has been demonstrated so clearly, that there is no excuse for any man in the community who believes it any longer. Yet here we find a large body of preachers, perhaps three thousand, following the lead of a circular which was calculated to mislead and deceive the public, have here come forward with an atrocious falsehood and an atrocious calumny against this body, and prostituted the pulpit, prostituted the sacred desk, to the miserable and corrupting influence of party politics. It matters not whether they have misled the whole of the people of New England, and drawn them into this pool of dirty water—it matters not whether the misrepresentation has taken a broad scope or been confined to a [illegible]ew—I hold it is our duty to expose the conduct of men who, either from ignorance or willful false knowledge, will avail themselves of their sacred calling to arraign the conduct of Senators here in the discharge of their duties. I hold that this Senate is as capable of judging whether our action involves moral turpitude, whether it involves the subversion of morals, whether it subjects us to the judgment of the Almighty, as are these political preachers who do not understand the question. It is evident that these men know not what they are talking about. It is evident that they ought to be rebuked, and required to confine themselves to their vocation instead of neglecting their holy religion and violating its sacred principles, and truth and honor, and getting up a document here which is offensive, and which no gentleman can indorse without violating all the rules of courtesy, propriety and of honor. There seems to be an attempt to file upon our table offensive documents, slander upon slander, libel after libel, in order that the abolition press may copy it as coming from the records of the Senate, and go back and give it credit in the country. They are smuggled in here, the offensive matter concealed from our knowledge until we happen to look into them and see what they are, and then these gentlemen expect to carry on a political campaign by quoting from our own records that we are traitors to God, to our country and to humanity. I think it is time that this miserable system of electioneering by violating the rules and the courtesies of the Senate to get an indorsement of libels of which men ought to be ashamed, should be exposed and rebuked. I am unwilling they shall come in and pile up slanders of this kind and insults of that kind upon our table, and let it then be used for base party purposes. The Senate knows that this memorial is not intended to effect the action of the Senate. We have no such bill before us. Our action on it is passed. Why is it brought here? There can be no other object in presenting it here now, than simply to afford capital for organizing a great sectional party, and trying to draw off the preachers of the gospel into it. I think that men ought to be able to rely upon argument, and upon truth, and upon reason, instead of resorting to these things for the purpose of stimulating excitement for political ends.

MR. HOUSTON said this matter had been sprung suddenly upon the Senate. He saw nothing informal or monstrous in the memorial. The bill was passed on the morning of March 4, and the memorial was dated on the 1st. It therefore was signed when the bill was before the Senate. He saw nothing in the memorial that offered any indignity to the Senate. It simply expressed the feeling of those who signed it. It was the right and privilege of all American citizens to memorialize Congress in respectful terms. He did not know what the object of the memorial was; but he should suppose from its contents, and from the character of its signers, that the memorialists believed there was something radically wrong in that bill. They charged that it was a violation of national faith. He had made the same charge against it in debate. He had shown that it was a violation of solemn plighted faith with the Indians, and that it said to the Indians that all treaty obligations were to be considered as nothing more than a solemn mockery. He had also said, that the repeal of the Missouri Compromise was as flagrant a breach of faith as the violation of the Indian Treaties. He saw no greater impropriety in ministers of the gospel memorializing Congress than politicians, or any other men, doing so. He had told the Senate that the passage of the Nebraska bill would lead to excitement and agitation, and it was denied. This memorial, signed by 3,000 ministers of the living God—his vicegerents on earth—was evidence that the people were deeply moved by it. Ministers of the gospel were men. They had the same political rights as other men. All citizens had a right to petition, and that right could not be denied. By becoming ministers of the gospel the memorialists had lost none of their political rights. There was no longer any use in denying that the Nebraska bill had revived again excitement. He trusted it had now reached its acme, and that soon all would be quiet, and that the country would be restored once more to that serene tranquility, happiness and prosperity which it was enjoying before the subject was introduced some weeks ago. It was not the proper way to quiet agitation, to condemn those who memorialized and protested against the act. If memorialists asserted untruths, and spread falsehood before the country, the proper mode to pursue was to have the subject referred to a committee, to have a report made of the facts, and then leave the intelligent people of the United States, with the whole facts before them, to judge for themselves. Whether the Nebraska measure was right or not was a question on which there was room for a difference of opinion. Senators were not in such a high place as to be above the right of the people to inquire into and criticise their official acts.

MR. PETIT, (Ind.) said he was in favor of the largest liberty to petitions, provided they were respectful. His first objection to the memorial was that it was out of time and out too late to affect any action on that bill, which had passed the Senate in all probability never to return. The Senate had done the deed, and now deserved the righteous judgment of Heaven. It would seem that the righteous judgment meant pains, torments, and punishments, but he expected it would be one full of approval for the deed. The Senator from South Carolina said he had great respect for clergymen so long as their robes were unspotted, and they did not dabble in political waters or pools of politics. He would agree with the Senator if he thought the pool of politics was any more polluted than the stagnant waters of contradictory theology, in which these clergymen lived. He believed the pool of politics far more pellucid, clean, healthy, and beneficial than the stagnant waters which surround the contradictory creeds and dogmas of these men, no two of whom could agree upon any particular point of theology. The Senate had an officer chosen for his ability and information, who was a brother clergyman, whose duty it was to expound divine law to the Senate; and he would, therefore, if the motion be in order, move to refer this memorial to the Rev. Henry Slicer, Chaplain of the Senate, with instructions to inquire and report to the Senate whether the Nebraska bill was a violation of the law of God, and whether the Senate was in danger of having invoked the judgment and condemnation of heaven by passing it. [Loud laughter.] If Mr. Slicer decided in the affirmative he would be willing to revoke his action, and would use his endeavors to induce the House to send the bill back to the Senate.

MR. SEWARD said that as others had expressed their opinion as to the memorial, he asked to do the same. If the presentation of this memorial here is wrong, it is either in regard to time, place, or circumstance, or character of the memorialists, or argument which the memorial makes. I think those who will reflect on the subject will see no censure can justly be cast upon the memorialists in regard to time. It has been the habitual practice of the Senate to receive memorials upon subjects not yet before the body for action, and which might never be. Of such character were the memorials upon the subject of liberty of conscience to American citizens in foreign countries which have been received without question. This matter was a subject of legitimate consideration for the Senate. Although the Senate had acted, its action is yet inchoate and liable to be reveiwed. When the bill shall pass the other house, if ever it does, it probably will come back with amendments. Even if this were not so, the Senate might be convinced by the arguments of memorialists or otherwise that they had acted unwisely and injuriously. If so, it is not too late to rescind our action. We can take measures to repeal the act if it shall pass. Was there anything wrong in respect to the character of the persons who have presented this memorial? It is said they are clergymen; but they are nevertheless American citizens, and the breader qualification of citizenship covers over the lesser and inferior character and description of clergymen. Every man who is a citizen of the United States—and according to my theory even every may who, although not a citizen, yet is a subject of the United States Government—has a right to petition the Congress of the United States upon any subject of national interest, or which can be legitimately a subject of legislation. Is there then any well-grounded objection to the fact that they describe themselves as clergymen? Certainly not. It is the right of a citizen, if he can petition, to do so in his own way. If he thinks there is anything in his character or position which entitles his opinions to higher consideration, or which leads to the belief that he understands the subject more thoroughly than others, it is right to describe himself by the appellation which designates his profession, his character or his office. It is only on this principle that the Legislatures of States make their voices known to Congress by describing themselves as Legislatures of States. They come here with their resolutions in character of petitions or remonstrances under that provision of the Constitution which guarantees the right of petition, and upon no other ground of constitutional right whatever. Is there any well-grounded objection to the language or the time of the memorial? I think not. While on the one hand it is such a memorial as a secular person like myself would not be apt to dictate or sign, because there is a solemnity of tone, seriousness and religious consideration which secular men do not indulge or affect. Yet on the other hand it is professional and natural on the part of the memorialists. It is in the character of those who make it. It is said they assume to speak the will and judgment and pleasure of the Creator and Judge of man and nations. I do not understand them as assuming to speak any such thing. I understand them as saying in substance as follows: "We, citizens of the United States, subscribing ourselves as Clergymen, in the presence of Almighty God and in his name, address the Congress of the United States." What is wrong or unusual in this? You do not commence your proceedings here in any day during the session without acknowledging and declaring that we begin in the presence and in the name, and with an invocation and blessing of, Almighty God. * * * * They come here declaring that they come in the presence of Almighty God. It is that universal and eternal presence in which we are all every day and hour of our lives, and from which we can never for a moment even escape. It is objected to because their address is in the name of Almighty God. What is that but a mode of arresting attention to their earnest remonstrance and prayer; while there are occasions on which we never suffer ourselves to forget we are responsible to the Almighty, it is equally true, that all our actions ought to be in the name of the Supreme Being. We may put off or lay aside the thoughts of that awful presence during our secular labors, and during a life of care, confusion and turmoil—but when we come to close our eyes upon the world we cannot shut them without the reflection that we are even here in the sight of the Judge of all men. Every man, when he writes his will or instructions for those to come after him, recites that it done "in the name of God." I should not adopt this mode of addressing the Senate or Congress. It is not my habit to do so; but I know it is the habit—it is in the character of those who have signed this memorial; I see no objection to it. Is it disrespectful to the Senate of the United States that men should say they speak to them in the name of God, and in his presence? If it be so, it must be because we claim to be here exempt from the superintending government and providence of that Being, in whom, by whom, we live, and through whom we exist upon earth. It is also objected that there is another offensive remark—that the memorialists think the measure against which they protest is immoral in its nature; and that among its consequences, it will draw down upon us—not upon the Senate; but upon the nation, the judgment of Almighty God. The great measure proposed is either moral or immoral. There is no neutrality between morality and immorality. We may conscientiously differ in ascertaining which is the moral side, but nevertheless it is moral or immoral. These think it is of one character—others think differently. It is our right to act, let them think what they will. It is their right to tell us their opinion just as they understand and believe. By the judgments of God I understand this moral, that every human act of any magnitude is connected with preceding courses and subsequent effects—that a right act is connected with usefulness, happiness, and all the blessings of just rules; and to those acts which, whether we deem them moral or immoral, whether intentionally wrong or not, or unwise, there are connected consequences of error, danger, peril, unhappiness and ruin. This, in my judgment, is all the expression means.

REVIVAL IN BROOKFIELD.

CLARKVILLE, March 16th, 1854.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Presuming that intelligence of revival interest is always cheering to the lovers of Zion's prosperity, I therefore cheerfully submit the following brief statement of God's doings with us.

About the 11th of February, we commenced a series of evening meetings in the north part of this church [2d Brookfield] which we continued for three weeks; and which, in answer to prayer, and under God's blessing, have resulted in encouraging those that were struggling to maintain the cause of God, and in reclaiming some who had backslidden in heart and in life, to the path of duty and the fellowship of the church; while some ten or twelve have professed a hope in Christ's pardoning love. Six have already submitted to the ordinance of baptism, and others are expected soon. Unto God be all the praise.

J. CLARKE.

GERRIT SMITH ON THE HOMESTEAD BILL.—Gerritt Smith's frank and Christian speech on the Homestead Bill, which appears on our first page to-day, will doubtless be perused with interest by all of our readers. That any considerable number of them will coincide with all of the views set forth, we do not suppose; but no one can read the speech without receiving from it new ideas, and feeling a stronger aversion than ever before to land monopoly.

We see, by the papers, that when voting time came, Mr. Smith cast his vote against the Homestead Bill—an apparent inconsistency which is explained by the fact, that just before the vote was taken, the bill was so amended as to limit its grant of land to white persons. In a letter to Frederick Douglass, Mr. Smith says:—

"If my fellow land-reformers, with whom I have so long toiled for the success of our land reform doctrines, shall be aggrieved by my vote, I shall be sorry. Nevertheless, I can never regret my vote. I was a man before I was a land reformer. And, for the sake of no gains, however great, or however many, can I consent to ignore the claims and even the fact itself, of a common manhood. But the advantages which are sought at the expense of trampling upon human rights are not gains. Such gains are losses—even to those who get them. The Homestead bill would have been purchased at too dear a rate had it proscribed only one negro, or only one Indian. The curse of God is upon the bill, or there is no God. There is no God if we have liberty to insult and outrage any portion of his children."

LABORS AND PROSPECTS IN WISCONSIN.—From a business letter of Eld. Varnum Hull, dated Milton, Wis., March 9, 1854, we copy a few sentences to show in part what is doing and what is waiting to be done in that region:

"I have been holding a few evening meetings in one part of the church, and a very good state of feeling exists. Six have made a public profession, and the brethren in that part of the church are much engaged."

"I have been to Oak Grove, fifty miles north of us, and preached on the Sabbath question several times—a good degree of interest being manifested. From Oak Grove I went to Bluffton, near Berlin, by request of Eld. Todd, and heard and replied to a Mr. Bristol. Notwithstanding the weather was bad, and considerable effort was made to prevent a general attendance, we had a good congregation, and I entertain no doubt that good will result from the meeting. There is much interest on the subject of the Sabbath in these parts, and I wish we had a competent man to teach and lecture for six months or a year through this part of Wisconsin and a part of Illinois. I have had several calls that I cannot attend to."

PRACTICAL AMALGAMATION.—The following paragraph is going the rounds of the papers, credited to the Rockingham Messenger. It shows that slavery and amalgamation go together practically. The old bugbear of abolition and amalgamation has ceased to frighten sensible people:—

Two brothers, remotely descended from ancestors of the negro race, in the maternal line, made application to a court at Richmond, Virginia, "asserting that they had so far removed from their original blood as to entitle them to the benefit of an Act of Assembly, which declares that persons with less than one fourth negro blood shall be considered white persons." Under some pretext, which does not appear, the court, after hearing argument on both sides, denied the application. The Richmond Enquirer approved the decision of the court, and said: "The law and circumstances under which this application was made, would free about one fourth of the slaves of the Commonwealth, and lead to interminable difficulties on the subject. One tenth negro blood would be little enough to place a negro on the footing of a white person."

REVIVALS AMONG THE BAPTISTS IN NEW YORK.—The New York correspondent of the Watchman and Reflector, says that the state of religious affairs in this city is in some respects quite interesting. Revivals are progressing in several of the churches. In the Norfolk Street, about fifty have been baptized. In the Laight Street, nearly as many. In several others, smaller numbers. And in quite a number, meetings are being held every evening; some of them are conducted by the pastor alone, and others by the pastor, assisted by another minister.

TOOLS FOR PALESTINE.—We are requested to state, that a box of agricultural tools for the Palestine Mission, valued at $26 28, was received in time, and taken along by our missionaries. The money to pay for them was contributed by the following persons:—M. Wells Crumb $1, John Babcock and Nathan Brand $5 each, Wm. A. Babcock $5 61, Leonardsville Manufacturing Company $9 67.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 13.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise were presented. Remonstrances against the ratification of the copyright treaty were presented. A memorial was presented praying for a grant of land to aid the State of New York in constructing a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. A memorial from Lieut. Maury in favor of opening the Amazon River, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Two messages from the President were then received—one communicating the correspondence of 1850 between Mr. Schenck, our Minister at Brazil, and the State Department, touching the African slave trade; and the other transmitting the correspondence concerning the arrest and imprisonment of James H. West by the authorities of Cuba in 1851, both of which were referred and ordered to be printed. Resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama in favor of the repeal of the duty on railroad iron, were presented; also, resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in favor of granting 160 acres of land to all soldiers of the war of 1812; also, resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois in favor of granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812. The Select Committee reported the Pacific Railroad bill, and it was made the special order of the day for Second-day, the 27th inst.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, a report was received from the Secretary of the Navy against the practicability of converting the ocean mail steamships into vessels of war. Mr. Chandler moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the resolution for the relief of the rescuers of the steamship San Francisco, which was lost. The Select Committee reported a bill establishing a railroad and telegraph line from the Atlantic States to the Pacific Ocean. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency Appropriation bill.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 14.

In the SENATE, a memorial from the citizens of Baltimore, praying for an improvement in the Patapsco River, was referred to a Special Committee. A memorial was presented signed by 3,500 clergymen of New England, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill. A very exciting debate ensued on the propriety of receiving the memorial. Mr. Douglass, in the course of his remarks, denounced the memorialists, impugned their motives, and characterized the charge that the passage of the Nebraska bill was a breach of faith, as a base falsehood, designed for political effect. Mr. Houston and Mr. Seward defended the right of the petitioners and the course they had pursued. The subject was finally laid on the table.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Appleton presented a petition 250 feet in length, signed by clergymen, against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The petition was not received. A memorial signed by 232 working men was presented, praying Congress to pass a law forbidding military superintendence over civil works. A bill was introduced to prevent and expose frauds on the Pension Office by advertising the names and residences of pensioners, which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. The bill granting lands to Wisconsin for railroad purposes was then resumed. An amendment to the bill was proposed and agreed to, providing that the title to land shall vest in said State, (Wisconsin,) nor patent issue therefor until twenty continuous miles of the road shall have been completed.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 15.

In the Senate, several remonstrances against the Nebraska bill were presented. The bill providing for an army retired list was passed. The consideration of the resolution contesting the right of Mr. Phelps, of Vermont, to his seat, was resumed, and after a speech by Mr. Foot defending the right of Mr. Phelps, the subject was again postponed. The bill authorizing the issue of registers to vessels owned by the Accessory Transit Company, was passed.

The HOUSE went into Committee on the Deficiency Appropriation bill. Messrs. Bridges, of Pennsylvania, and Brooks, of South Carolina, made speeches in favor of the Nebraska bill. Mr. Breckenridge of Kentucky then explained the provisions of the Deficiency bill, and said he could see no serious objections to any of the items contained in the bill, except, perhaps, that of $530,000 for the purchase of the Assay Office buildings in the City of New York. The Committee then rose, and the Speaker laid before the House the President's message in reference to the recent outrages on our commerce by the Spanish authorities. It was of a moderate character, stating that he had already taken measures to open negotiations with Spain on the subject, and in the event of their failure to produce a settlement, he should again refer it to the attention of Congress, with a view to the adoption of more positive measures, which in that case he should execute with rigor.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 16.

In the SENATE, a communication from the Secretary of War was presented, transmitting the report of the Board of Commissioners appointed some years ago to investigate the claims preferred against the United States, arising and growing out of the war in California. Remonstrances against the passage of the Nebraska bill and violation of the Missouri Compromise were presented. Petitions in favor of securing religious liberty to American citizens abroad were presented. The case of the Vermont Senatorship was then finally disposed of. Mr. Phelps was turned out of the Senate, only 12 Senators voting in his favor and 26 against him. A resolution was then adopted paying Mr. Phelps a sum equal to the per diem and mileage of a Senator from the first day of the session.

In the HOUSE, after the usual routine of morning business, Mr. Giddings of Ohio moved to reconsider the reference of the special message of the President of the United States in relation to the seizure of the steamship Black Warrior by the authorities at Havana. Mr. G. condemned the grounds taken by the President, and said that the opportunity would be seized upon by designing men to embroil this country in a war with Spain. Mr. Bayly of Virginia sustained the sentiments as expressed by the President in his message, and moved to lay Mr. Giddings's motion to reconsider on the table, which was agreed to. Great excitement was apparent in the House while the matter was under consideration. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency bill.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 17.

In the SENATE, a bill was reported to provide better accommodations for the United States Courts and Post Office at Philadelphia, which was passed, with an amendment subjecting any purchase that might be made to its ratification by Congress. The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of bills upon the private calendar, when, after a warm debate on the bill granting relief to the heirs of Rinald Johnson, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, a large number of petitions were presented against the extension of Slavery and a repeal of the Missouri Compromise; also, one praying for a grant of a township of public land to each college in the United States; also, one from the citizens of the City and County of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the renewal or extension of the Woodworth patent for plaining boards. The consideration of the Deficiency bill was then resumed. The motion to strike out the appropriation of $530,000 for the purchase of the Assay Office buildings in the City of New York, was concurred in by a vote of 85 to 57, and the bill as amended passed by a vote of 138 to 11. Adjourned over until Second-day.

European News.

The steamer Arabia, with European news to March 4th, arrived at Boston on the 17th inst.

The leading fact of the news by the Arabia is the accession of Austria, and the probable accession of Prussia, to the League of the Western Powers. That Austria has joined France and England against Russia can no longer be doubted, since Napoleon expressly affirms it in his speech at the opening of the French Legislative Body; and that Prussia will follow suit is highly probable from her manifest unwillingness to comply with the Czar's demands, and close her ports to the allies, and from the permission she has given her officers in the Turkish service to remain there. This then is equivalent to the addition of the greater part, if not all of the German States to the League, and leaves the Czar alone to contend against united Europe.

Actual operations exhibit no new features, but every power in Europe continues to arm, France, England and Russia on an immense scale. Sir Charles Napier is appointed to the command of the Baltic allied fleets, and Admiral Seymour is in command of over twenty ships already assembled at Spithead.

On the Danube, the deep snow prevented any movement by either army. The weather was becoming milder, and the Russians were making ostentatious preparations to cross the Danube. Omer Pasha was evidently aware of their plans, and was making dispositions of his forces to check them.

The Greek insurrection was in a fair way of being suppressed. Several British ships-of-war were ordered from Malta to the Piraeus. The Pasha of Jania had defeated the Greek insurrectionists at Arta, but had not sufficient force to disperse them.

An insurrection of quite a formidable nature had taken place in Saragosa, Spain. The insurgents for a considerable time held the Castle of Aljaferia and other strong positions. A brigadier horse regiment revolted, and the Captain-General attacked them with three columns of infantry and some cannon. Several horses were killed, but the insurgents retained possession of the Castle that night, but the next day losing courage, they retreated, and the royal troops took possession of the city, and some cavalry pursued the fugitives. The city was placed under martial law and disarmed.

CATCHING A FUGITIVE.—On the 10th inst., near Racine, Wisconsin, a colored man named Joshua Glover, was arrested on a charge of being a runaway slave of B. S. Garland of St. Louis Co., Mo. He had been in the employ of St. Clair & Rice, in a mill near Racine. On Friday night, while seated in his shanty, five men broke open the door suddenly, rushed in upon him and felled him to the ground. They then handcuffed him, took him into a double buggy, with nothing on but his pantaloons and shirt, and drove off north, and, after having lost the way, at last brought him to Milwaukee County jail. Here he was lodged in a cell, handcuffed.

As soon as the matter got wind, great excitement prevailed. A habeas corpus was immediately got out, a civil warrant for assault and battery was issued against the persons who made the arrest, a public meeting was held, and strong resolutions were passed. Towards evening, a steamer arrived from Racine, bringing about one hundred men, who marched in solid column to the jail, where the negroe still remained in charge of two deputies of the U. S. Marshall. This accession to the numbers of the crowd added fuel to the flame, and after a short time a demand was made for the man; a refusal being made, an attack was made upon the door with planks, axes, &c. It was broken in, the inner door and wall broken through, and the negro taken from his keepers, brought out, and placed in a wagon, which was driven at great speed down to the Walker's Pt. Bridge, where he was placed in another carriage and taken south, on the way to Racine. The military was called out, but had not gathered when the crisis came.

ACCIDENT, AND LOSS OF OVER TWENTY LIVES.—The passengers by the steamship Brother Jonathan, which left San Francisco on the 16th of February, met with a sad accident in crossing from San Juan del Sud. The accident occurred in Virgin Bay, about 100 yards from one of the landings. It appears that about 80 persons embarked in a launch for the purpose of going on board the steamer, when a sea rolled over her entire length, and all on board were swept into the water, twenty-four of whom were drowned. Sixteen bodies had been recovered. The first body recovered was that of a woman upon whose clothing was found large sums of gold; her husband was also drowned, who also carried thousands of dollars, the weight of which perhaps aided in causing their deaths. One man had upon him an inflated life-preserver, but beneath it was a belt of gold sufficiently heavy to weigh him down. The persons of most of the drowned were encumbered, containing more or less gold.

STEAMER BURNT AND LIVES LOST.—A dispatch dated Louisville, Tuesday, March 14, 1854, says: The Memphis and White River steam-packet Caroline was destroyed on Sunday, the 5th inst., on White River, about twenty miles above the mouth, and from forty to fifty lives were lost. The vessel took fire between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and the flames spread so rapidly that it was with difficulty any person escaped. As soon as the fire was discovered, the pilot steered the boat for a bank and ran her out about twenty feet. The scene that followed is indescribable. Fifteen persons took possession of the yawl, but she sunk and every one of them perished. The captain—Creighton—jumped into the river and was drowned. John Trice, the pilot, perished at the wheel. The boat burned to the water's edged, when she slid off and sunk, proving, with her cargo, a total loss. Only two cabin passengers were lost, the remainder being deck passengers and hands on the boat.

A NUT FOR ABOLITIONISM.—A bill has recently passed the Senate of Virginia, for the purpose of allowing certain free negroes in the county of Nottaway to enslave themselves. These negroes had earnestly petitioned to the legislature for this privilege. Mr. Campbell, the able and estimable senator from the Nottaway district, in making a statement of facts to the Senate, said they were manumitted by the will of a gentleman in his district, and that their desire was to be sold to their late master's next kin. A large number of respectable citizens of Nottaway, feeling an interest in the negroes, for their good character, added their recommendations for the same object. The bill has passed the Senate, and we have no doubt will pass the House.

The Independent copies the foregoing from the Richmond Dispatch, and adds:—

So grievous are the social and legal oppressions inflicted by Virginia upon Free People of Color, and so low is the value of liberty there esteemed, and so crushed is human nature in a portion of the people, that they actually seek personal slavery as a refuge from intolerable ills. There is no other land where such monstrosity can be found

SUMMARY.

One of the most atrocious robberies that we have heard of (says the Washington Union, 17th,) was committed in our city yesterday. Miss McNeill, daughter of Gen. John McNeill, deceased, and a neice of President Pierce, was met in one of the public streets by a ruffian, knocked down, and robbed of her purse, containing about $30, certificates of stock amounting to about $2,000, and a valuable diamond pin. The blow was so severe that she was rendered insensible, and while in this condition was robbed. We understand that she was much injured, but are glad that her injury is not dangerous. This bold robbery took place about 3 o'clock P. M., in one of the public streets, and the robber succeeded in making his escape.

The Albany Atlas of March 16th says:—We are compelled to record the death of a well-known citizen. Friend Humphrey died last night, after a protracted and painful struggle with disease. He was a merchant of this city, whose long life of industry and devotion to business was crowned with ample wealth. He had the respect of his fellow citizens, and was at different times Mayor of the City and State Senator. He was identified also with the educational and religious movements of the denomination of which he was a leading member, (the Baptists,) and was a liberal giver. He dies lamented.

The result of the Investigating Committee of the new Board of Directors of the Crystal Palace is arrived at. It appears in substance, that the indebtedness of the Association is about $170,000. The loss on the Exhibition is estimated from the 1st January last to 9th March, at a little over $19,000, or about $334 per day. It appears, therefore, that the Company had sunk: Its whole capital, $489,000; all its receipts, about $330,000; and is in debt, $170,000; total, $1,039,000. Against which it has the Crystal Palace building, insured for $91,000, Kiss's Amazon, &c.

We have news from Mexico—important, if any thing can be so deemed from that decrepit State. At Acapulco the Revolution under Gen. Alvarez was spreading, mauger the Government; the fort was still in possession of the Revolutionist, and Alvarez, thus far, had been successful in keeping the forces sent by Santa Anna from marching on Acapulco. The mountain forces of Alvarez are represented as powerful and faithful to their leader. The Government was prepared to dispatch, in all, against him 12,000 men. Acapulco was blockaded by two schooners sent by Santa Anna.

On the farm of Greenbury Mountjoy, in Union County, Indiana, a young woman by the name of Freeman shot herself. A young man by the name of Veets had been out hunting, and called at the house where Miss Freeman was living. While he was sitting on a chair with his gun in his hand, Miss Freeman sat herself on his lap, and in an apparent jesting manner took hold of the gun and placed the muzzle to the side of her head, and spoke to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, (in whose house she was,) to "look here," and at that instant the gun went off, killing her instantly.

A bill has just passed the Wisconsin Assembly, granting a city charter to the village of Portage. This is another instance of the rapid growth of Western towns when well situated. Three years ago it was but a bare frontier settlement around the old Fort Winnebago. It has increased in size and business till it numbers three thousand inhabitants, and is in the center of trade for a large tract of the best country in the State. It is one of the natural points toward which commerce and emigration set by an irresistible attraction.

At a late missionary meeting, held in Boston, by the Methodists, one of the speakers remarked that from the southern border of Texas to the South Pole, not eight evangelical ministers are to be found; and from the city of Morocco to the mouth of the Euphrates, hence to the borders of South Africa, and back to the starting point—in this immense triangle, with a population of 70,000,000 souls—there is not one Christian mission.

A great storm of wind passed over portions of New York State on the 18th instant. At Albany one hundred buildings were unroofed. In other places much damage of the same kind was done, and several lives were lost.

There was a serious riot at New Haven, Ct., on the night of the 17th inst., growing out of a misunderstanding between the students and town boys. One man was killed by a stab.

The wife of Senator Gwin of California has recently come into possession of from fifty to a hundred thousand acres of valuable land in Texas, where she formerly dwelt. For her good luck in the matter she is greatly indebted to Richard P. Robinson, of Helen Jewett memory, who together with his wife was under obligations to herself and her husband for her kindness.

Solomon Jewitt, of Middlebury, Vt., arrived in the Atlantic, with a lot of Pigs from the stock of Prince Albert, and several pens of poultry from the aviaries of Windsor Castle, which took premiums at the late Royal Poultry Society's Exhibition. Mr. Jewitt is one of the largest importers of French Merino Sheep in this country.

A dispatch dated Louisville, Wednesday, March 15, 1854, says: The steamer Reindeer burst her flue at Cannelton, Ind., yesterday, scattering misery and death in all directions, Forty or fifty persons were killed and wounded. Many were blown into the river and drowned.

Thomas Adams, Sheriff of Norfolk County, Mass., has been convicted of selling liquor in violation of the prohibitory law. The liquor was seized upon an execution. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $10 and costs, and give bond in $100 not to violate the law for one year. He refused to comply with the terms of the sentence, and was committed to jail.

The Keowee (S. C.,) Courier states that Fort Hill has been purchased by Col. A. P. Calhoun, from his mother, Mrs. Floride Calhoun, relict of the late Hon. J. C. Calhoun, and will be immediately occupied by him. He returns to his native State with an ample fortune, accumulated on the fruitful soil of Alabama.

A dispatch dated Louisville, Friday, March 17, 1854, says: By the sinking of the steamer J. L. Avery, below Natchez, on the night of the 9th inst., we now learn that fifty lives were lost. The steamer was bound for Cincinnati from New Orleans.

The Stonington boats, for Boston, Providence and New Bedford, on Thursday last changed the hour of leaving Pier No. 2 North River from 4 to 5 P. M. The C. Vanderbilt, newly repaired and furnished, came into the line on that day.

The State Election in New Hampshire, last week, went against the democratic party—a result which is considered equivalent to repudiating the Nebraska iniquity.

DIED,

In Clarkville, Madison Co., N. Y., Feb. 21, 1854, sister AMY CLARKE, wife of Maxson Clarke, Jr., aged 46 years. She had been a worthy member of the Baptist Church for about thirty years, and for a number of years, up to the time of her death, she observed the Sabbath of the fourth commandment. Hers was a bright example of the power and influence of Christian principle. Her heart to sympathize with the afflicted and distressed, and to administer every aid and comfort in her power, not only won for her the esteem of all, but greatly endeared her to the community in which she lived. Hers was also a rare example of Christian fortitude and patience, and of the power of sustaining grace. Her suffering for some six months was intense, yet she was ever enabled to say submissively, "For me to live is Christ; to die is gain." During the last few weeks of her illness, she exhorted all, as she had opportunity, and her strength would allow, to be faithful to Jesus, and meet her in heaven. By this afflictive providence, the community and church have been bereft of a much esteemed member, and a fond husband, and affectionate daughter, of a good wife, and doting mother. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

J. C.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., March 11th, Mr. HINKLEY PIERCE, of consumption, aged 33 years. Mr. Pierce professed a hope in Jesus before he died, leaving his friends the satisfaction that their loss was his eternal gain.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., March 15th, STEPHEN S., only child of Stephen R. and Clarinda Burdick, aged 1 year and 6 months.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see the dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then is it irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

The [illegible]'s Sick Child.

I saw upon the harvest field
A mother [illegible] child;
The mother [illegible] disconsolate,
The bairn [illegible] smiled.
It did not [illegible] it was wont;
It neither [illegible] nor played;
But by the [illegible] warm, sunny side
Lay still [illegible] it was laid.

The mother kissed it tenderly,
And wrapt it [illegible] her plaid,
And clapp[illegible] lautit it,
And stro[illegible] curly head;
Then look[illegible] mournfully,
And tear[illegible] face,
As she fond[illegible] folded it
In a farew[illegible] embrace.

But when [illegible] a faint complaint
Her ears [illegible] ish shook,
And back [illegible] and came again
To take [illegible] look;
And closer [illegible] hid the sheaves
To shield [illegible] the breeze;
And kneel[illegible] ore to comfort it,
Upon he[illegible] knees.

And gladly [illegible] watched it there,
But the [illegible] expired,
And she w[illegible] gain to toil,
And slow[illegible] ired.
Her childre[illegible] depended on
The labors of [illegible] arm;
And there [illegible] at child alone,
And hoped [illegible] from harm.

But every [illegible] that she laid
Behind [illegible] sheaf,
She cast on [illegible] infant's couch
A stealth[illegible] grief.
And when [illegible] and weary rig
To the [illegible] was shorn,
She hurried [illegible] fore the rest,
To sooth[illegible] born.

But when [illegible] where it was laid,
She start[illegible] with fear,
To see its [illegible] ntenance,
And then again came near.
Its large black eyes were firmly closed,
Its wee white head was chill,
And deep solemnity reposed
On its face so pale and still.

It neither answered to her voice,
Nor raised its drooping head,
Nor breathed, nor smiled, nor sobbed, nor sighed—
Alas! the child was dead.
Its dying struggle was unseen,
Its infant [illegible] fled
While its poor mother struggled hard
To earn her daily bread.

And those fond mothers who have seen
The greenest, loveliest leaf,
Of their life's summer withering,
Will know that mother's grief.

Lime as a Fertilizer.

It has been said, that "lime is the basis of all good husbandry." Ten years ago, looking at the effect of lime and marl in the improvement of British agriculture, there was much force in the assertion. Modern agricultural practice, the introduction of guano and superphosphate of lime, together with the teachings of inductive science, however, have thrown much doubt on its truth. Certain it is, that in England, at least, the use of lime as a manure is on the wane. It is found that the same beneficial effect can be produced at a much less cost, and, like its sister system, the summer following. It has been, in most instances, superseded. We must not, however, rush to the other extreme, and discard the use of lime altogether. There are many soils which are very much and permanently benefited by an application of lime, but we have no rule whereby we can arbitrarily decide which they are. Analysis will not materially assist us. As a general rule, peaty, mucky, or low swampy lands are most benefited, but they require a very large amount to render the application decidedly and permanently beneficial. On such soils, three hundred bushels per acre is ultimately the most profitable quantity to use; and, indeed, on all soils where liming is decidedly beneficial, a large quantity should be applied at once. Oyster shell lime, from the fineness of its particles, has a quicker effect than ordinary limestone lime, and need not be used in such large quantities. It is plain that liming is an expensive means of enriching the soil, and that it should only be resorted to where other means will not bring about the same result.

Science did not teach the art of liming. It was the result of observation and experience; perhaps originally, like the use of plaster, of accident. And it is somewhat remarkable that science has not yet thrown much satisfactory light on the rationale of the process. There are many theories, all of which have some appearance of correctness, but which are unfortunately contradictory. We shall not stop to examine them all. There is probably some truth in most of them. The three most prominent reasons assigned are, first, lime is a constituent of all agricultural plants, and therefore lime is beneficial. Second, lime by a well known chemical process, renders the insoluble potash of the soil available to plants, and as plants contain a large quantity of potash, it is to be presumed that by liming, which is equivalent to applying potash, we greatly increase the crop. Third, lime greatly accelerates the decomposition of organic matter, changing it into suitable food for plants.

To the first reason we say, that if lime was beneficial, merely from supplying an actual constituent of the plant, one hundredth part of the quantity which experience shows to be best, would be amply sufficient; and a few hundred pounds of plaster, from its greater solubility, would be much better than several tons of lime. Lime, however, is very beneficial in many cases where plaster has no good effect. For these two reasons, we think the benefit of liming is not because it supplies lime to the plant. The second reason assigned is most ingenious, and to some extent undoubtedly true. But we have never seen any good effect follow the direct application of potash to wheat, barley, turnips, &c., while, if the theory is right, it should have given great crops. We come to the conclusion, therefore, that the increase of crops derived from liming, is owing, in a great degree, and in most cases, to the increased amount of organic matter, especially of ammonia, which, by accelerating decomposition in the soil, lime renders available to plants. There are some objections to this view, but on the whole, it is the only one which we can, at present, reconcile with demonstrated facts respecting the value of ammonia to wheat and other cereal crops.

The old English practice of liming, then, is one of exhaustion. It increases the crops, not because it supplies, like barn yard manure, Peruvian guano, sulphate ammonia, &c., the elements which the plants most need, but because it renders what already exists in the soil available. If these elements were not in the soil, lime, in most cases, would do no good. And it is found that, when land has been once limed, the second application is less beneficial than the first. Under such circumstances, it is not to be wondered at, that, guided by experience and the teachings of true science, the quantity of lime used as manure in England, is less and less every year, while every effort is made to increase, by keeping more stock, and purchasing American oil cake, and other cattle foods, the barnyard manure; and if more than this is required, by buying guano, sulphate of ammonia, &c., which of themselves supply those elements of which the soil is most deficient. We do not anticipate, therefore, that lime, except in rare cases, and for special objects, will ever be extensively used as a manure in this country. [Rural New Yorker.

Mr. Glidden's Sheep Management.

Gen. Glidden, one of the most experienced and successful in this department, thus writes in a late number of the Journal of Agriculture:—

I made my selection of sheep twenty-two years ago, from the best flocks in this vicinity, for fine wool. I selected a farm for that purpose, and assigned for my sheep-pasture a swell of land that bears sweet feed, and affords them a chance to shelter themselves with the woods from storms. I secured to them a shade upon the high lands, by sparing trees for that purpose, when I cleared the land; but if I had none, I should build them a shelter, until I could grow one. I have been careful not to breed in, to get the proper shape for bucks, and the right grade of wool. I turn the bucks with the ewes in the middle of December. I let them have lambs at three years old, and wean the lambs about the middle of September, giving them a cattle pasture, or a field, always allowing them a better chance of feed at the time of weaning, and putting a few old ones with them to prevent them from getting wild.

MODE OF WINTERING.

I take the old sheep that have raised lambs, and look them over carefully, to see that the age is right, and that the shape and grade of wool is what I want; then put them in a yard by themselves, where they can be sheltered from the storms; not to exceed 100 in a flock. I feed them three times a day on good hay, when they first come to the barn; after two or or three weeks, I give this flock coarse fodder once a day until the weather grows warm in March; then I give them good hay again until they leave the barn.

I take the wethers for another flock; if they are to be stall-fed, or to be turned soon after shearing, put them in another yard, where I can have the means of giving them grain. I take my yearling sheep to another yard, for they are the hardest flock to winter, owing to the state of their teeth. I take the lambs for another flock; give them early-cut hay through the winter, which causes them to grow through the winter.

In all cases, I feed in racks, and shut up the sheep in bad storms of rain, as well as snow. If I over-feed the two last-named flocks, I turn the old sheep in to clean the racks; but in all cases where the hay is good, let them eat clean. I rake out the sheep-pens once a day, and give to the colts or cattle.

Having got my sheep selected, I then watch over them, and see that they have water to go to at all times when the weather is favorable, and that they all look full and plump. If any of the old sheep fail to do well, put them in with the lambs. If this apartment gets too full, throw back, or give better keeping to those flocks that fail.

When the snow leaves the ground, I turn into my mowing fields, appropriating to each flock a separate field. I then feed twice a day until they leave for good. My sheep run against a common stone wall, and I believe all sheep would if they were properly brought up and properly cared for. By this I would say, that if I should put 300 sheep into a pasture of 100 acres for the summer, I think they would be likely to leave it, even if the wall was poled.

SUMMER TREATMENT.

I wash and shear from the first of June to the first of July, as I find the season. I do not wash at this season, because I have done planting, or got the highway taxes worked out; but for the reason that the weather then is right for them to part with their fleeces.

The sheep being sheared, I sort them again, to suit the size of the pasture; the wethers to take the best feed, if I intend to turn them early; salt once a week. If the sheep have ticks, wash the lambs in tobacco-juice, or salt brine; or rub the wool full of snuff.

Farmer's Club of the American Institute.

From the Tribune we copy the following report of a meeting of the Farmer's Club, connected with the American Institute, New York, held March 11th:—

A letter from Mr. Ernst, of Cincinnati, reports very favorably upon the value of the Japan pea as an American field crop. The report of all who have tried it is that the yield is enormous, and the peas, or more properly beans, are good food when matured, but not in the green state. The plants may stand out all winter, and the fruit keeps well, though easily separated from the husk by threshing when gathered.

A letter from Dr. John G. Graham states that the premiums offered for fat cattle in France, at the shows to come off in April, amount to $13,730. They give two classes; one to native cattle, and one to foreign stock. The price of beef has fallen three per cent. lately in France.

Dr. Graham says that owing to the high price of flour of wheat, that of beans has been more largely mixed with wheat this season, and by experiment proved that bean flour contains double the amount of nutriment.

An insect resembling, and probably identical with our wheat weevil, has become very destructive to the grain in store. An experiment has been tried of running the grain through a mill similar to our smut machines, which entirely destroys the weevil.

Mr. Meigs read a statement that a variety of corn from the north side of the Pyrennes, had been matured in England in forty days. One writer said he planted in June and gathered in October.

Experiments have been made which prove that a bushel of carrots and a bushel of oats, fed together to a horse, are worth more than two bushels of oats; yet an acre of ground which will yield forty bushels of oats will produce a thousand bushels of carrots.

Mr. Robert L. Pell said he had grown a thousand bushels of carrots to the acre, by subsoil plowing and high manuring, on sandy loam soil, on his farm in Ulster County. He soaks the seed 36 hours in brine, and rolls it in plaster. Any light, friable, rich soil, will grow carrots. A soil not destitute of any of the mineral compounds that plants require for their growth has been cropped more than 150 years in England in succession, without manure, and has always produced fine crops. At our last Club it was stated that some gentleman in Europe had grown crops without manure by plowing and pulverizing the soil. The reason was, that the ground he experimented upon contained the necessary mineral compounds. Lands not very remote from the Hudson river have not produced their owners an interest on twenty-five dollars per acre, still they may in many instances be made to yield crops paying an interest on $110, by the application of potash, soda, or perhaps lime not costing over $3 50 per acre, or any other substance that may be deficient in the soil, either naturally or by cropping. All natural soils bear some crop, but soon become exhausted of some one of the eleven necessary ingredients, and for the want of that one, all the others are useless. There is plenty of land covered with five finger vines, that was once productive, and would be again if some cheap mineral constituent was restored to it.

Mr. Paul Stillman, of the Novelty Works, who has lately returned from California, sent twenty packages of very choice melon seeds from the ranch of Capt. Edward Perrine, near Marysville, many of which are quite new there, and will be entirely so here. A portion of these and some other seeds were distributed to those present.

The Half Housekeeper.

She was only a half-housekeeper. Go where you would about her home, there was neither taste nor neatness. She would begin things with great avidity, but lose all her zeal before she got through. Of her husband's half-dozen new shirts, all were partially finished. One wanted sleeves, another a collar and wristbands, another a bosom and gussets —and so on through the list. Several skeletons of quilts laid unfolded in her drawers, and her tables and trunks were loaded with magnificent promises.

Her bread was always unpalatable, because she forgot this or that—and though she had been married ten years, in all that time the table was never rightly laid for a meal. Either the salt was wanting, a knife or spoon, or some important ingredient. This afforded good exercise for the family, and there was at all times a continued running to and fro.

She was a half housekeeper. Her meats were never properly cared for after dinner —and then it was "la! throw it away; it ain't much." Much or little, it made the butcher's bill enormous, and her husband half distracted. There always stood about her room a dozen garments worn out by trampling rather than use. She was forever tripping over brooms—forever wondering why on earth work came so hard to her—forever running up stairs for something which she had left down cellar, or flying down cellar for what she had thrown in the garret.

Her children's clothes came in pieces the second day, because they were half made; her preserves soured the second month because they were only half done, and her temper soured quicker than any thing else. She was continually lamenting that she ever married, and wondering where folks got their knack of housework. She loved to clear a corner for herself, and sit with her arms folded. She loved to gossip—loved to have some new scheme on hand, for then she was furious till it was begun, always losing her enthusiasm at the first stick. "O dear me!" seemed some days the whole extent of her vocabulary, and it would make one sad to watch her listless movements, and hear her declare that no woman worked so hard as she; which was partly true, for she had no method.

She never received company without an apology on her tongue, and never sat them down to a decent table. She dragged through life and worried through death, for which, I fear, like every thing else, she was only half prepared; and left six daughters to follow her example, and curse the world with six more miserable half housekeepers.

Comparative Economy.

If our farmers and their wives would commence to-morrow to live as do the majority of mechanics and the better-paid laboring men, one half of them would be bankrupt in two years. As a general thing, a farmer and his wife, worth two, three, or even ten thousand dollars, practice an economy in food and clothing that would quite shock the self-respect of a coal-digger and his wife.

The great difference between Mr. Dumars and ourself lies in our different interpretation of "decent clothes" and "decent food." We say fip calico for clothes, and mush and molasses for food, is decent, and that we would dress in and live on it, rather than spend our life at the mercy of employers, or anybody else. Nor would there be the least danger of our dying from want on even that regimen. But there is no occasion for a working man's limiting himself to such scanty fare. At one dollar per day—and few get less—a family of five can be comfortably clothed, and fed, and sheltered, leaving half of it to secure an independence. That once secured, he has an opportunity to display his taste, and proclaim his self-respect in the quality of his food and clothes.

On our return from Harrisburg, we traveled in the cars with a family who illustrated what we mean—a New York machinist, wife and child. He was in a suit of best French broadcloth, and every little while he went on the platform to smoke a Spanish segar. She was in a rich silk dress, at not less than a dollar and a quarter per yard, made with flowing sleeves, and under these were fine lace sleeves, heavily embroidered; of the cost of which we have no idea, as we should never think of asking the price of such an article; but from their delicate texture, their flowing dimensions, and the rough usage they got while the wearer nursed an unruly boy of sixteen months, we supposed they would be done before her journey was ended. Those sleeves, we imagine, cost as much as our entire dress, yet we thought ourself decently and suitably clad; but, to be sure, we are one of those who "know nothing about poverty," and live in a "comfortable house," while she is one of those whom society and capital are oppressing very sorely. The cost of the dress her child wore, with the braid and braiding, would have purchased him two suits more comfortable, more appropriate, and therefore prettier. Their carpet-bag was well supplied with oranges, candies and cakes, while they took regular meals at the hotels where the cars stopped for that purpose. According to our opinions the tables were loaded with every thing requisite, and a good many superfluities —luxuries that nobody should eat—but both at one meal where they sat near us complained of the quality of the viands.

In the same train was an Ohio farmer, wife and child—he in a suit of jean at about thirty-one cents per yard, she and the baby in shilling prints—in their carpet bag a large supply of nice home-baked cakes, spiced with fennel from their own garden. They did not go in for meals, but ate their cakes and drank water; yet anybody could see they had a home to go to; and were accustomed to walking over their own broad acres, and sleeping under their own roof.

The difference in the outfit and traveling expenses of the two families would have secured a homestead—paid the "first gale," and left the possessor free from the tax of rent—quite out of the power of those grasping landlords. [Mrs. Swisshelm.

Telegraph from Newfoundland to Ireland.

An official document, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy by Lieut. Maury, giving the results of the deep sea soundings effected by Lieut. Berryman from the shores of Newfoundland to those of Ireland, has been published. These seem to be decisive of the question as to the practicability of a submarine telegraph across the Atlantic Ocean in that region, the distance between the nearest points of the two countries being one thousand six hundred miles, and the bottom of the sea being a plateau the whole distance, singularly adapted to the purpose of holding a line of magnetic telegraph wire. The depth of the plateau is quite regular, gradually increasing from the shores of Newfoundland, where it is fifteen hundred fathoms, until it reaches two thousand fathoms when approaching the other side. This is just suited to the purpose, the depth being such as to secure the wires against all the perils of icebergs, anchors, &c., and yet not too deep to be useful. More remarkable than this is the fact that, upon the admirable plateau, "the waters of the sea appear as quiet and as completely at rest as they are at the bottom of a mill pond;" "that there are no perceptible currents and abrading agents at work at the bottom of the sea upon this telegraphic plateau;" "consequently a telegraph wire once lodged there, there it would remain, as completely beyond the reach of the accidents of drift as it would be if buried in air-tight cases." Lieut. Maury suggests that a national prize be offered to the Telegraphic Company through whose telegraphic wire the first telegraphic message shall be passed across the Atlantic.

The Poultry House.

As every thing connected with poultry now-a days has a peculiar interest, we give the following sensible remark from an English paper. First, of the roost and nest house. The floor should be sprinkled with ashes or loam or pulverized peat or fine charcoal, and the floor should be cleaned off every week.

"The yard should contain a grass plat, some fine gravel, slaked lime, dry ashes, and pure water. The nests should be lined with moss heath or straw. Evidently the Dorkings are the best breed; they will lay an average of 185 eggs each per annum. Fowls with black legs are best for roasting, while those with white legs are best for boiling. If you want them to sit early leave the eggs under them. Fowls in their native habits never lay more eggs than they can hatch. Remember that no success can be expected from poultry keeping, if their houses be damp, cold, unclean, or badly ventilated; if their food does not approximate to that which they get in a state of nature, viz., a mixture of animal and vegetable food; if the water they drink be stagnant, the drainage of the manure heap, &c., or if the strongest and handsomest be not bred from." How to Choose a Domestic.

Housekeeping is not so full of sunshine and rose-colored bliss as many imagine. It is hardly possible to get along without cooks, scullions, and chambermaids, and what with their waste, wittles, and impudence, says Aunt Sally, they are plaguy drawbacks on domestic peace and comforts. Old Peppergrass was the "customer" for discriminating between the useful and the careless. Peppergrass sent word to the Register office that he wanted a good girl for general housework. About the time he expected an applicant, he laid a broom down in the yard, near the gate. Presently a girl comes up to the gate, opens it, and strolls up to the house; the broom being immediately in the path, Miss Betsy strides over it. The old man was on the watch, and the first salute the girl got was, "I don't want you." The girl sloped, and suddenly bullet-headed Nancy appears. Seeing the broom in her way, she gives it a kick, and waddles up to the house. "You won't suit me, that's certain, Miss Mopsy!" calls Peppergrass. She disappears in a hurry; and finally a third appears; opening the gate and coming into the yard, she carefully closes the gate behind her, and walks up—the broom is still in the path; this she picks up, and carries along to the house, where she deposits it along side the woodshed. Before the girl could explain her business there, Peppergrass brawls out, "Yes, yes, come in, you'll suit me." And she did; for that girl lived with Peppergrass seven years, and only quitted it to go to housekeeping on her own hook; and a capital wife she made. Peppergrass was right.

The Japan Pea.

Much has been said within a year about a new luguminous plant, said to come from seed brought from Japan.

Teschemacher gave a description of the plant, which he calls Cajanus bicolar, a native of East Indies, Amboyna, Japan, &c.; flower small, interior yellow, vexillum purple, erect shrub, pubescent, nearest in alliance to Lupinus. The seeds are good to eat, and when young, very delicate. On soaking the round seeds for an hour in moderately hot water, they take exactly the form and appearance of the common white bean, become quite tender, and have a pure and delicious nutty and oily flavor. The whole plant, with the seed, is excellent for fattening hogs and cattle.

Mr. Ernst, of Cincinnati, has done considerable to get this new plant before the American farmers, considering it a valuable one for this country. The seed is as good as the common white bean for food, and better adapted for rich soils and warm climate, and the straw is excellent fodder for stock; and it promises to yield bountifully of both. In planting the peas, be careful to give them plenty of room to spread, as the stalks grow from three to four feet high, with an erect, bushy stem, having numerous branches which are thickly set with short, woolly pods. It seems to delight in a rich, loamy, moderately dry soil, and a rather warm climate; but it does not need a very long season. It certainly is a most wonderful prolific bearer, and no doubt will prove a valuable addition to our farm crops. [Tribune.

How Nature renovates a worn-out Soil.

In this connection let me call your attention to one of the processes that nature adopts to renovate a worn-out soil; she makes use of a rotation of crops. Suppose we visit the plains in Brunswick, where there is but little potash in the soil. Well, what is going on there? Nature has planted there, during the present century, at least, the pitch pine (Pinus rigids) for the unmistakable purpose of renovating that miserable soil;—a hard case, gentlemen, but nevertheless true. Those trees send down their roots in some instances, it is said, to the depth of seventeen feet, and bring to the surface the potash and other elements. But does this tree deposit its potash in its wood or bark? By no means—the wood of the pine requires but little potash, but it carries it through the tree into the leaves, which require a large proportion of that element. These leaves fall every year and assist by annual acquisitions in the formation of a new soil, so that even on the unpromising sand plains of Brunswick and other towns, you will find nature slowly but surely at work, forming a sutbale soil for some other crop, which in the lapse of ages she may see fit to introduce.

GOT HIS REWARD.—A Washington letter says that some women of Alliance, Stark Co., Ohio, have ingeniously sowed thirty three-cent pieces between two sheets of gauze, forming a transparent mat of three or four inches square, and have sent them to Senator Douglas with the following letter. The letter is signed by something over one hundred names:—

To Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, Member U. S. Senate:—

SIR: We the undersigned, wives, mothers and daughters of Stark County, Ohio, feeling grateful that our boasted "Land of the free and home of the brave" is yet so free that white husbands, sons and brothers can enjoy their own liberty, beg to present to you the inclosed "thirty pieces of silver" as a testimony of the sentiments we entertain for your labors in the Nebraska bill. If Judas was worthy of his reward for betraying one, whom he knew had the power to extricate himself from the hands of his crucifiers, then much more are you worthy of this reward, (should no office of emolument be proffered you,) for this betrayal of liberty; for this effort to cast into hands, more brutal than Jewish crucifiers, thousands of unoffending, weak and helpless fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, sons and daughters, accused of no infraction of religious or civil law, and whose blood is called for by no maddening populace, but by cold-blooded avarice and the foulest passions. Without dwelling upon this horrid picture further, may you receive the "thirty pieces of silver" herewith sent as an evidence of the consideration in which we hold you, and ere you follow the last act of Judas, may you repent in deepest sackcloth this most nefarious betrayal of Liberty.

ALLIANCE, March 1, 1854.

VALUE OF ACORNS.—The editor of the Advocate, Claiborne, La., has gone into a minute calculation upon the value of one crop of acorns in that parish—equivalent to our counties. He says that 1,800,000 pounds of pork will be consumed there in the year 1854, by the 12,000 inhabitants, and that the whole of it comes from the crop of acorns, and is worth the snug sum of $90,000. Besides this he thinks an equal value has been added to the stock hogs. He thinks also that that parish grows $35,000 worth more cotton than it would if all the planters had to depend upon the corn crop for their meat, so that the actual value of a crop of acorns is $215,000.

VARIETY.

The Female Humane Society of Elizabethtown, N. J., has been in active operation forty-four years! It is conducted by sixteen managers, and one feature of this society, perhaps the crowning one is, that it has continued with the united and harmonious labors of the different evangelical denomiaations, seeming to have but one aim, the good of those benefited? Their first directress is still living at an advanced age, but retained as such as a memento of her efficiency, and to stimulaate to energy and perseverance those that remain.

The Religious Recorder states that Rev. Benjamin Mills, of Frankfort, Ky., has accepted a call to the charge of a small church in Chilicothe, Ohio, which could offer him but $400 per annum, while he has had before him another call from a large and flourishing church, with an offer of $1,200. He said, "The large church can easily secure a good pastor with the salary they are able to offer, while the little church of Chilicothe might not succeed so well." Therefore he accepted the less inviting call.

Dr. Bridgman says, that the last census of China which he saw in print, was for the year 1813, which made the population of the Empire more than 361,000,000. He is confident that the present population cannot be less than 400,000,000.

The leading bankers doing business at Sonora, California, headed by Adams & Co., have published their united agreement, to "close their offices on Sundays, and holidays that are prescribed by law."

SABBATH DISCUSSION.

Brookfield, N. Y., March 22, 1854.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The Sabbath Discussion condensed below was begun Sept. 20, 1853, at the Baptist meeting-house in Clarkville, between Rev. John Crawford of the Methodist Episcopal Church in favor of the first-day Sabbath, and Rev. Lucius Crandall for the seventh-day Sabbath, and continued four days, as agreed on previously. By previous agreement, Elder Crawford was to commence at half past 10 each day, and speak two hours, and in the afternoon of each day Elder Crandall had the privilege of speaking the same length of time.

By request, the writer took copious notes of the remarks made by each speaker throughout the four-days' discussion. Of course the entire discussion would be too voluminous for insertion in The Recorder; and to condense, or abbreviate, and do entire justice to each side of the question, is a difficult task; but it is hoped that no one will complain of injustice or partiality, though some verbal variations may inadvertently occur.

During the discussion, Elder Crandall was several times unkindly charged with originating this discussion, and laboring to make proselytes. Justice to Elder Crandall requires that the origin of the discussion should be better understood. In the latter part of the winter of 1853, a protracted meeting was commenced at the Methodist Chapel in Clarkville, in which all were invited to participate, without reference to denominational distinctions. A very extensive revival was the happy result. Soon after the commencement of this revival, some of the converts that had been in the habit of keeping the seventh-day Sabbath were called upon and urgently invited to join the Methodist Church; and when the subject of the Sabbath was mentioned, one of their ministers, a man of brilliant talents, called their attention to several passages of Scripture, to convince them that the first day of the week is the Sabbath. He stated, that he was willing to discuss the subject publicly with any Sabbatarian; and he could show as many passages in favor of the first-day Sabbath as could be shown in favor of the seventh. These or similar challenges were afterwards several times repeated. And when Elder Crandall came here in the summer, as agent of the American Sabbath Tract Society, the writer was asked, "Why does not Elder Crandall discuss the subject publicly, as they are ready and willing on the other side?" The writer mentioned these things to Elder Crandall, and he concluded to deliver two Sabbath lectures on different evenings during his short stay in the place. He did so. The first lecture was not of a sectarian character; but was mostly an appeal to his brethren for a more faithful observance of the Sabbath. It was expected that his second lecture would be of a more debatable character. It was so. And it was expected that some one of the several Methodist ministers present would reply. In this lecture the claims of the Sabbath were advocated, as predicated on Gen. 2: 2, 3, and as made for man, that is, all mankind, and obligatory on all men in all ages. At the close of the lecture, Elder Beebe, the minister in charge of this circuit, arose and stated that he was not posted up on the subject, or prepared to discuss it; but as their General Conference would be held at Madison Village the ensuing week, some one would probably be procured there to discuss the question at some future day. It was expected that the Rev. A. White, who was present, would reply to the lecture. He arose and stated that he fully agreed with the lecturer in every thing he had advocated or stated. It was then agreed to have the subject discussed at some future day, if a speaker could be procured at the Conference. Elder Crawford was procured, and the preliminaries agreed on as above stated.

Yours, &c., H. B. Clarke.

Sabbath Discussion,

Between Rev. John Crawford and Rev. Lucius Crandall, at Clarkville, N. Y., Sept. 20th, 21st, 22d, and 24th, 1853.

September 20th.

Mr. Crawford commenced the debate, and spoke as follows: We intend to show, that the Sabbath was changed by Christ and his disciples. The seventh day could not be kept in the order of the creation in all parts of the world at the same time. Therefore God would not give a law for all men, that all men could not keep at the same time. One seventh day—one day after six days—is what is meant. The difference in latitude and longitude would prevent the observance of the seventh universally. In the religious institution of the Sabbath, the seventh day from creation was not intended. Not a syllable is stated in the Decalogue, when the Sabbath shall commence, or at what time the days of the week should be commenced. A day of sacred rest should be kept, after six days' labor.  Nor could the Jews perceive what particular day was to be the Sabbath.  Six days of labor, and then a day of rest, is what is required; not that each man should select his own time, but all should keep the same day. The first day reckoned in the Decalogue was reckoned from the day that manna first fell, and without reference to the days in succession from the creation of the world.

By our Saviour and the disciples, the present Sabbath (first day) was kept somewhat different from the Jewish institution.  Where is the Sabbatarian that keeps the Sabbath as commanded, without kindling fires, and stoning the violators? If you keep the Jewish Sabbath, you must inflict the penalty on violators. If that course was pursued, there would not be a Sabbatarian left in one week, except the last man. They say we shall go to hell because we do not keep the Sabbath as commanded; and they shall go to heaven, because they pretend to keep it, but do not! I have known Sabbatarians to work on the seventh day at haying; and one family to draw logs to mill, because it was likely to rain, that their mill might run! Lord have mercy on Sabbatarians, if they are bound to keep the Jewish Sabbath! Numbers 15: 32.

The precise day of the week not being the essence of the Sabbath, &c., only a circumstance, the variation of the day of reckoning does not affect the morality of the Sabbath, any more than the changing the modes of worship would change the morality of the second command.  I say, that one day's rest after six days' labor, is all that is necessary.  The time was so deranged in the times of Joshua and Hezekiah, by the prodigious lengthening of days, that the seventh day could not be kept.

The Sabbath was changed by the same authority that enacted the Sabbath: Christ changed it himself. The Apostles were divinely inspired; and after the resurrection they kept the first day as a Sabbath, and Christ met with them, and continued forty days instructing them. On the day of Pentecost, he changed the day, when so many were converted.  We have as strong proof that he changed the Sabbath, as we have that he changed the rite of circumcision to baptism.  As the Father was honored for creation, so should the Son be honored for the act of redemption—a far greater work. The particular changes of the ceremonies of the Sabbath were no more proper or necessary than the change of the day.  The Sabbatarians dwell on the Sabbath, and neglect to call sinners to repentance; and my opponent goes about the country to make proselytes to the Sabbath. If he would attend to the conversion of sinners, we should have had a glorious reformation. [A cry of amen! from Elder Beebe.]  The Jewish Sabbath typified the resting of Christ on the Sabbath in the grave, and thus abolished it.  The Son of Man was Lord of the Sabbath.  There was no greater work than creation, except redemption. The second was done by greater efforts—for creation was a work of command—redemption by the blood and death of Christ.  If convinced that the seventh day Sabbath was binding, I should not dare violate the first day—I would not dare violate that day. I will stop here, to hear from brother Crandall. (Spoke 1 h. 20 m.)

Elder Lucius Crandall spoke as follows: I shall not talk about all that has been said; much of it has no bearing on the question under discussion.  Mr. Crawford stated that 'we shall show by arguments, that the day of the Sabbath was changed—not the law.'  The declaration in the 2d chapter of Genesis is generally allowed to be the foundation for the Sabbath. Not much is said in the Bible about it until the exodus of the Israelites. It has been stated by Mr. C., that the time of the Sabbath was reckoned from the falling of manna, and so the days of the week. (See Ex. 16: 5.) The Sabbath, Ex. 20, was named in connection with the original rest, without referring to the falling of manna. I leave it to you, whether that does not settle this question.

I want to notice some remarks, viz., 'that the Sabbath can be changed, and the law not changed.' If it be said that we cannot keep the day in its order, God could keep the time. He commanded them to keep the Sabbath as an institution known. "Remember the Sabbath," &c., predicated the Sabbath on the Sabbath of creation. The command does not refer to an institution as Sabbath, but the particular day. Not a Sabbath that could be moved around. The seventh day was sanctified. You can as easily separate the day from itself, as the Sabbath from the very day that God appointed.  Suppose we attempt to make the first day the Sabbath, because God rested on it! That is untrue. In our view, the command obliges us to keep the Sabbath from creation, and not affected by a difference of latitude or longitude; but in regular succession of light and darkness. If a man should, of necessity, be so placed that the time could not be known, he would not be responsible for impossibilities. These objections cannot affect the institution. We hold our opponents to obedience to God's laws, where obedience is possible, and not otherwise.

[The arguments of Elder Crawford in regard to the change of Sabbath by Christ and the apostles; and 'Do Sabbatarians keep the Sabbath as commanded?' 'The lengthening of days in the time of Joshua and Hezekiah,' were here fully answered by Elder Crandall.]

I admit that the deliverance of the Jews was named as a reason for their obedience; but not as a reason for the command.

'Pentecost.' We see nothing in it for us to answer—do not know what bearing it can have on the question under discussion.

'Circumcision changed to baptism?' We deny it.

'Son of Man Lord of the Sabbath?' No objection to it—He kept the Sabbath.

'The Sabbath typical?' We deny it. There is no reason given for the Sabbath which is prospective, but commemorative. It is not a type of Christ. What an absurdity to say it was typical of Christ's rest in the grave! Does it compare with the activity of those times?  A type of Christ in the grave is better than some other reasons given by our opponent. Then rest on the Sabbath, as Christ did, in the grave.

'Redemption greater than creation?' A mere assertion, that we do not know to be true. If a greater work, and a reason why the day should be kept, then more would be required than for the seventh day. (Elder Crandall spoke 52 minutes.)

September 21st.

Elder Crawford spoke as follows: Mr. Crandall said yesterday, in reference to Ex. 16: 4, 5, "I will rain bread," &c., that this passage had reference to the days of the week in regular succession from the creation, and the Sabbath as instituted in Paradise. It had no reference to the creation, or the institution of the Sabbath. Mr. Crandall contended, yesterday, that the Sabbath had been handed down from generation to generation from Gen. 2: 2, 3, to the days of Moses. MARK THIS; the Sabbath was given to Moses before he gave it to the Jews, in commemoration of their deliverance, and not in commemoration of creation. Moses said, Keep this day in commemoration of your deliverance from Egyptian bondage.  Exodus 16: 45 was the first institution of the Sabbath.  Gen. 2: 2—"He rested on the seventh day," &c.—and for 2500 years no one kept the Sabbath, in heaven or on earth.  It appears unaccountable to me, that no mention is made of a Sabbath for 2500 years, if a Sabbath was in existence. It was not given to any of the antediluvians, nor to any of the family of Noah. No reason is given, or complaint made for any one not keeping a Sabbath during that period.  Mr. Crandall says, that if the Jews lost their reckoning, God did not. They did forget or lose their reckoning.  God rested after six days labor. That is all the proof there is that the Sabbath was kept for 2500 years.  Elder Crandall cannot prove that he is keeping the seventh day in regular succession from the creation. I will be a Sabbatarian, if he will prove that point.  I am sure they are not keeping that day. What evidence have we that the first day, Gen. 1: 5, was Sunday? It may as well have been Tuesday, from any authority we have.

Yesterday Mr. Crandall misstated my remarks in regard to the resting of Christ in the grave.  I say that the suffering and death of Christ would have been an everlasting disgrace, if he had not risen, which was the crowning act of his glory. It is said that Bro. Crandall and the Sabbatarians make light of the death and resurrection of Christ.  The first time the Sabbath was given to the Jews was Ex. 16, which was 2500 years from the creation. Mr. Crandall says that Moses commanded the Jews to keep the Sabbath in reference to the creation. No such thing is mentioned in this chapter; yet Bro. Crandall says they understood it. Good gracious!  The words in Gen. 2, do not show that God blessed the day; he blessed the Sabbath. Deut. 5: 12 to 21, shows that the Sabbath was given in commemoration of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage.

Elder Crandall spoke as follows: Mr. Crawford says that after six days labor a Sabbath is required, without any reference to the time of commencing—and still men are not at liberty to commence when they please. Now, if the law only requires one day's rest after six days' labor, any person may commence when he pleases. This is the common argument of our opponents. Yet they contend that the Sabbath is enjoined by the fourth commandment. Our opponents, in the nature of their position in regard to the institution of the Sabbath by the fourth commandment, make it of perpetual obligation on them.  In regard to the Sabbath being a sign, I have no objection to its being considered a sign, if it can be determined what it is a sign or figure of.  In regard to the redemption by Christ, we deny the time when our opponents pretend it was finished. See John 17: 4—"I have glorified thee on earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." See also John 19: 30—"It is finished." ***

Mr. Crawford contends that that the Jews did not know of any Sabbath until it was given to them in Exodus 16: 23. Why did the Jews, on the sixth day, gather a double portion of manna? Because of their previous knowledge of the Sabbath. How did it occur, that on other days the surplus manna spoiled, and on the seventh day did not? ***

Mr. Crawford asks, "How do you know that you are keeping the seventh day?" I hold that the Lord has authorized us to say that we are right in our calculation of time, by his miracles and by his laws. From the time of giving the law, the Jews never all lost the reckoning; and Christ recognized their reckoning. The Jews, Christians, and Mahomedans agree in their reckoning of time.  If we have a commandment to do a certain thing, (indefinite,) we should be bound to do according to our best knowledge and belief. If a man will do his duty when he knows it, he will do it when he thinks he knows it. ***

Mr. Crawford says he don't know what I mean by the new ministration. I refer him to the 3d chapter of 2d Corinthians. He will pretend that by this chapter the Decalogue was done away, or the Sabbath done away, and the rest of it remains. I contend that the Decalogue is not done away, but the ministration is done away; he will not say that the penalty of stoning for adultery is continued, but will say that the law against it is continued.

The celebration of the Lord's Supper shows forth his death—and not his resurrection. (Large quotations from Rev. A. A. Phelps, and Eusebius and others, to show the continuance of the seventh-day Sabbath.)

I will now call your attention to many ancient writers, to show that the seventh-day Sabbath was kept even by those that observed the first day; not as a Sabbath, but as a festival.  (Several authors quoted.) I now refer you to the writings of N. Bound in 1595, Peter Heylin in 1636, Bishop White in 1655, Thomas Morer in 1701. (Extensive quotations.) Mark this, that these historians mention the first day as a new institution. Remember, that it is Rome that has been all the time making changes. It is a Roman relic to have Sunday as a festival in opposition to the Sabbath. "After celebrating the Lord's Supper in the morning, they all went to their daily labor." Did they honor Christ's resurrection on that day, or God by working?  "Either in the days of the apostles, or afterwards, the people did not for many years cease their labors on Sunday."  "Sunday was not kept with more strictness than the other forty days after Easter." For a thousand years and more, after Christ, Saturday was always called the Sabbath. Mr. Black, now living, says that up to the present time, Saturday is still called the Sabbath in the British Records.  Some of you have wondered how so many of you were keeping the first day, if it was not of Divine authority.

(Elder Crandall spoke 1 hour 52 minutes.)

September 22d.

Elder Crawford spoke as follows: This morning, friends, I am under the necessity of calling your attention to the point I so often mentioned yesterday, that they are keeping the regular day in succession from creation. Mr. Crandall said that there is no probability that the reckoning was lost through the patriarchal ages; and that the reckoning was right at Exodus 16; and in the days of Christ the reckoning was acknowledged right by him. There is no evidence of that; and until he proves it, there is no need of going further in the debate. This assertion ought to be proved, or Sabbatarianism totters and falls, to rise no more! One Sabbatarian minister inquired for the proof that they were keeping the regular day; the absence of such proof so worked upon him, that he moved away, and afterwards kept Sunday. (Query by Elder Wm. B. Maxson—"Will you name the man?" Answer—"No.")

Mr. Crandall next comes to the second part of my argument, in regard to punishing the violation of the Sabbath, by gathering sticks and kindling fires. He does not tell us how the law in regard to the penalty was changed. He said the punishment was no part of the sabbatic law. He refers to 3d chapter in 2d Cor. as evidence of change of ministration. This is a mightier leap than when he passed over the chasm of 2500 years. No commentator takes the view of the 3d of 2d Cor. that Elder Crandall does; unless the Sabbatarians have such a commentary.  You are bound to keep the Sabbath as commanded, applying the penalty, in absence of a change of penalty. There is not a Sabbatarian that keeps the Sabbath as commanded. ["Prove that," said Elder Maxson.] Elder Crawford said, "God help us to be open to conviction, and do our duty!" [He then referred, sarcastically, to the authorities quoted by Elder Crandall, viz: Peter Heylin, Bound, and Bishop White.]  I think that Sabbatarians may go to heaven, and first-day people may; for it is not of much consequence.

Bro. Crandall quoted authority showing that anciently, after the people met on Sunday in a part of the day, they went to their daily labor. Now, do not the Sabbatarians do the same? Do they not go home from meeting, and milk the cows, and fodder? (Quoted by Elder Crawford, as authorities for keeping first-day Sabbath, Psalm 118—"This is the day," &c.; Acts 4: 11, 12; Isaiah 11: 10; Romans 1: 4.)  Christ's rest at the resurrection was a glorious rest, which will be continued to the end of time.  Hebrews 4: 9—the word that is here rendered 'Rest' is Sabbatismos, and means a keeping of the Sabbath. You say that Christ and his disciples kept the Sabbath; you cannot prove it. They went among the Jews on that day, and lectured, but did not worship, and sing, and pray on that day.  Christ did not appear to the disciples when they were assembled together on any occasion except on the first day.  He continued to meet with them weekly until his ascension. The meeting, Acts 2: 1, 2, was on the first day of the week. The Passover this year was on the seventh day; and fifty days thereafter would be on Sunday.  (As evidence that the first-day people are right, and Sabbatarians wrong, the great numbers of the former, and the small numbers of the latter, were stated.)

The acts of public charity, 1 Cor. 16: 2—a proper work for the Sabbath.  Rev. 1: 10—the apostle John wrote this nearly 100 years after the birth of Christ, when the first day was called the Lord's day. All the ancient fathers honored the Lord's day. See Justin Martyr 167; see also Ireneus, Dyonisius, Clement, Eusebius, Mosheim, and Robert Burnside: "The seventh day was kept by Christians for the first 300 years, but in conjunction with the first day;" says the last named writer. Christ was born on the first day of the week; and the church has been blest for more than 1800 years in meeting on the first day of the week.  Those keeping the seventh day have not been blest. If they were right, they would be more blest; and if we were wrong, we should not be blest.

(Elder Crawford spoke 2 hours and 3 minutes.)

Elder Crandall replied as follows: I will commence with a review of Elder Crawford's remarks. I have formerly stated, that I should not answer all his remarks, for the reason that many of them have no connection with the subject; particularly his personal allusions. He has repeated his remarks over and over; and my former reply to them must suffice.

His scripture quotation, Ps. 118—"This is the day," &c. The Psalmist is here referring to the coming of Christ. The day here referred to has no reference to any day of the week, nor to twenty four hours, but the Gospel era.

Mr. Crawford referred to Isaiah 11: 10, "In that day," &c., as authority for the first-day Sabbath. This has been referred to by commentators as the future gathering of the people—not a Sabbath. Romans 1: 4, misapplied. Heb. 4: 9—"There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God." This is a rest that God's people have through Christ, without reference to a weekly Sabbath. If there be any allusion to a Sabbath here, it is the future rest of the people of God. Luke 24—The gathering in the evening was, according to our reckoning, on the second day; as the evening after the first day was a part of the second day of the week. .. John 20: 26—"And after eight days," &c. We do not admit that this was on the first day, as "after eight days" must be more than a week. Do not know whether the day of Pentecost was first day or not. The meeting was on the day of Pentecost; and only Pentecost, without any reference to any particular day of the week. Tyndall, a martyr, translates Acts 20: 7 as follows: "On a Sabbath-day the people came together to break bread," &c. They came together to break bread, if our English translation is correct. They came together without any reference to the resurrection, but in commemoration of Christ's death. ..... It is certain that those who have quoted Ignatius and others, have generally perverted, so as to make them favor the first day as Sabbath. "Let us keep the Sabbath in a religious manner;" but the first day was observed as a festival; not as a Sabbath. So far as history can be relied on, Sunday was not observed as Sabbath, until the time of the Reformation.

Mr. Crawford denies the new ministration, as applied to the penalty for the violation of the Sabbath, but will he deny it in reference to adultery and disobedience to parents? Christ's construction in regard to the law of the Sabbath must be considered as the true meaning and design of the Sabbath. The first-day people urge the fourth command, and quote Jeremiah, &c., to show the blessings of keeping the first-day Sabbath.

New Testament authority for the Sabbath: Matthew 5: 17, 18; Watson's Institutes, the standard theological authority of the Methodist Episcopal Church, says, (vol. 2, page 469,) "No part of the law is repealed, except the ceremonial and typical." "With the moral precepts it is different." "Think not that I have come to dstroy," &c. Mat. 5—"He shall be last in the kingdom;" that is, "shall be furthest from it—shall not attain it." "Christ taught the young man that the decalogue must be obeyed, or a person cannot enter heaven." See Luke 16: 17, Luke 4: 16, Rom. 2: 12, 17, Rom. 7: 12, 14, Rom. 9: 21. Some hold that persons are delivered from obligation to the law; Paul held otherwise. See James 2: 8, 12.

Eld. Crandall spoke 1 hour and 26 minutes.

September 23d.

Elder Crawford spoke as follows: In Bro. Crandall's reply to my remarks, he refused or neglected to show that they were keeping the seventh day in regular succession. He says there is no regular Sabbath except the one in regular succession. I have shown that it would be impossible to keep the seventh day at the same time all over the world. If two men in ships should go around the world in different ways, one keeping Saturday, the other keeping Sunday, both would keep the same day when they meet. .... "His rest shall be glorious." Not his resting in the grave. It was the day "when the morning stars sang together," &c. ... We (Christians) have had a conflict with Judaism and Sabbatarianism all along, ever since the resurrection.  Now it was on the first day of the week that Christ entered into his mediatorial rest, and rested from his work of redemption, as God rested from his work of creation. The work was not all done when Christ said, "It is finished!" He had not yet spilled his last drop of blood.  The meeting at Pentecost was not held in the synagogue, or publicly, but in a private house in Jerusalem.  1st Cor. 16: 1, 2. The collections were made on the first day, because the public meetings were held on this day, as formerly collections for the poor were made on the seventh day among the Jews, and the first day is now used as the Sabbath.  The seventh-day people have not been blest; they have about seventy preachers, and a few thousand members; while the Methodists in the United States have a million of members. Bro. Crandall says the command for keeping the seventh day is moral, but the penalty is not binding, but that you may keep it as you please. You say that God excuses Sabbatarians for violating the Sabbath, but will send us to hell for not keeping it. (Some authorities quoted as yesterday to show that Sunday was observed as Sabbath by Christians, anciently, viz: Ignatius, Ireneus, Eusebius, Clement, and others.)  In regard to keeping the Sabbath, Bro. Crandall says, we live under a new dispensation; and then reads from Watson's Institutes to show that every jot and title of the law must be kept. He says that if you keep the Sabbath with some variation, God will excuse you, but will not excuse us, first day people. Bro. Crandall says that unless we keep the whole law we shall be damned. Then all Sabbatarians will be damned. If you are bound to keep the moral law, you are bound to keep the Sabbath of the Jews.  Then, if you are bound to keep the law, the Lord have mercy on you Sabbatarians! I will here close, unless Bro. Crandall brings forward some new argument, that might have been brought forward before; but if he does, I shall answer it this evening at the Methodist house.  I love the Sabbatarians, and love Bro. Crandall, but do not like the simplicity with which he has argued or discussed this subject. I would lay down my life for the Sabbatarians. They hold to close communion.

Eld. Crawford spoke 2 hours and 1 minute.

Elder Crandall's closing remarks were as follows: Elder Crawford has repeated to-day nearly the same arguments as yesterday; therefore but little time will be taken in reviewing his remarks. His argument or statement in regard to two men sailing around the world would effect the Sunday-keeping as much as the other day, which is all the notice I shall take of it. Mr. Crawford contends that the evening after the first day was a part of the first day. But the fact that the sick were brought on the evening of a certain day to be healed, because it was considered not lawful to heal on that day, shows that the evening was a part of the next day, as in Gen. 1: 5, 8, &c.  I wish to correct Mr. Crawford's remarks in regard to my wish to bring history into disrepute. I only wish to say, that the writings of the Fathers are so contradictory, that but little reliance can be placed on them. They state that the first day Sabbath has no divine authority, but the authority of the church. After the Reformation the Romish and Lutheran Churches declared the law of the Sabbath void. Watson's Institutes makes the law of the Sabbath binding.  Gen. 2: 3—God sanctified the seventh day; that is, set it apart to religious uses. It cannot be construed otherwise.  It has been stated, that when they met to worship, it was always on the first day of the week. This statement is incorrect. Acts 13: 42—"And when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles besought that these words might be preached to them the next Sabbath." Acts 13: 44—"And the next sabbath day came almost the whole city together, to hear the word of God." Acts 17: 2—"And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures." Acts 18: 4—"And he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath," &c. See also verse 11, and Rev. 14: 10, Mark 2: 27, 28. Wayland and others of Providence, R. I., two years ago, took the ground that 'man' is a generic term, and that the Sabbath was made when man was made, &c. Elder Crawford and some others contend that the Sabbath was made for the Jews. The first day folks generally contend for the Sabbath as we do; on account of the first institution of it, &c.  We deny that the term Lord's day, Rev. 1: 10, refers to the first day of the week. This term is extensively disputed by ancient writers. We deny that Christ ever commanded or authorized the first day as a substitute for the Sabbath. The ordinances, &c., that were against us, were abolished—not the moral, but the ceremonial. The Sabbath could not be considered as included in the things against us, for it is for us.  If a Sabbath had been against us, then the first day Sabbath would be equally against us. Throughout the whole Bible, the seventh day is called the Sabbath; and in no place in it is the first day so called.  We contend that the fourth commandment has not been abrogated. I quoted Watson's Institutes to show that other denominations agree with us, that it is now in force.  We hold that our opponents are wrong in contending against God's law. We must keep the seventh day because He made it for us, and commands us to keep it, and we must obey him. We cannot lay by our conscience and follow you in error, because you prosper and flourish therein. We have been mourned over by our opponent on account of our unprosperous circumstances. This is altogether gratuitous. The abuses of our opponents do not offend me. We take up this subject on account of our duty to you, brethren.

Elder Crandall spoke about 50 minutes.

WORSHIP IN ATHENS.

"Irenæus," the editorial correspondent of the New York Observer, writes to that paper of "a Sabbath in Athens." His account of the services will be read with interest:—

We walked up a narrow lane, and knocked hard upon a small gate in a high stone wall, which was immediately opened, and found ourselves in the garden before the humble residence of Dr. Jonas King. On another side of his enclosure he has a chapel where he formerly held public worship on Sunday, but he thinks it more prudent to have it now in his own house. In a long room on the ground floor, we found a company of thirty or forty Greeks assembled, chiefly men; some of the members of the University, one or two of them occupying positions of influence in the city, several females well dressed, and all sitting with apparent solemnity and earnest attention. Dr. King rose, and all stood up while he offered prayer. It was short, solemn, in a soft and pleasing tone of voice, that answered well to the state of feeling in the room. Then he read a portion of Scripture from the New Testament. Holding the book in my hand, I was now able to follow him, and to watch the countenances of those who heard. It was an impressive portion, embracing several of the parables of our Lord, the marriage supper and the talents, and was heard with great interest by the whole assembly. He then took the text—"And the door was shut," from which he presented the necessity of immediate exertion to gain admission into the kingdom of heaven, before it should be too late. His manner was earnest and often very impressive, as he pronounced in that most mellifluous of all tongues the words of life, and begged the listening souls to enter the open door without delay. A fine looking young man, sitting immediately in front of the speaker, was greatly moved. At one time I thought he would start from his seat and ask the preacher to take him by the hand and lead him in. Dr. King has so long been accustomed to the Eastern modes of thought and expression, that he has a happy facility in illustration, which renders his addresses at once intelligible and interesting. In the midst of his discourse one of the officers of the army, in full military dress, entered, and declining the offer of a chair, stood with fixed eyes, till the service was concluded. After sermon was a prayer and the benediction, when the company retired with decorum and solemnity; as it appeared to me, impressed with what they had heard. It was decidedly a missionary scene. The strange costumes, the foreign tongue, the singular manners, all brought before me the sight I had so long desired to see, and it was a special gratification to me, that the first scene of the kind met me in Greece, and under the preaching of this venerable man of God, who has suffered so much for Christ's sake, and whose name is so dear to the churches in his own land. To be in Athens is an event in any man's life, but to hear Jonas King preaching the gospel at the foot of Mars Hill, is a joy to be cherished in memory even in heaven.

Miss Martineau tells a story of an old woman who was urged to cross the river Forth in a ferry boat at the time that a storm was brewing. She hesitated. The boatman asked her if she would not trust in Providence. "Na, na," said she, "I will not trust in Providence as lang as there is a bridge at Stirling."

SABBATH-BREAKING PARTNERSHIPS.

Suppose a professed Sabbath-keeper to start business on his own account, no partner being concerned with him. Suppose that, as the Sabbath draws near, he makes no arrangement for suspending business, but continues right on. Suppose him, on the Sabbath-day, to give his orders to the men in his employ just as on all other days of the week, and that the work of the establishment ceases not during all the sacred hours. Would he be guilty of sin? Would he be justly chargeable with the violation of God's law? "In it (the Sabbath) thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates." Say, reader, in the light of this most explicit law, would the man who conducted his business in the manner supposed be guilty of sin against God? There can be but one answer to this question.

Now, if such a man, a professed observer of the Sabbath, would sin in doing so, is it not sinful for any and every body else to do it? For what is sin? Is it any thing else but transgression of the law? And if the law binds all mankind, then whoever fails to do what it requires, sins. The fact that one has never pretended to keep the Sabbath alters not the case; he is as much a transgressor as if he had made ever so great pretensions. Is a man who takes the life of another not a murderer, because he never pretended to hold human life sacred? Is one who steals another's purse not a thief, because he never pretended to respect other people's property? Is one who defiles his neighbor's wife not an adulterer, because he never pretended to regard the law of purity? There is no sophistry which can make these things any thing else but transgressions of the divine law, and therefore sins, let the pretensions of those who are convicted of them be what they may.

He who fails to remember every seventh day of the week, to keep it holy, does sin against God, simply because he fails to do what the law requires. We do not say that the same amount of criminality attaches to the one who makes no pretensions to keeping the Sabbath as does to the one who professes to keep it and yet allows his business to go on. That depends on the amount of instruction he has received as to the nature and claims of the Sabbath. He may have had so little instruction, that his criminality is very small compared with that of the other. But the actual fact of his transgression is in no wise affected by the degree or amount of knowledge which he possesses.

Now, if all Sunday-keepers, or (which amounts to the same thing) all who fail to keep holy the seventh day of the week, are in point of fact transgressors of the law, is it not our duty as Sabbath-keepers to tell them so? Is it not our duty to act in such a way as will best tend to make them feel it? Have we any right to be mealy-mouthed about it? Have we any right to talk, or act, so as to make them feel comfortable in their sin? What though they be not as criminal in their transgression as they would be if they had more knowledge—does that give us a right to withhold knowledge from them? Does it make it right for us to tell them that they are not guilty? Does it make it right for us to act so that they would naturally infer that we did not consider them guilty?

Sins of ignorance are indeed less criminal than sins against knowledge. There is less moral turpitude in them. But if the ignorance under which they are committed so far destroys their nature that they are not sins, then there is no room for reformation. If it may be argued that a man is not a Sabbath-breaker simply because he does not know himself to be such, why give him any instruction on the subject? Why not let him alone as a righteous man? If men are not guilty of adultery, murder, theft, lying, oppression, when they do these things in their ignorance, why not let them alone as righteous? Why tell them that they are doing wrong? Why introduce the law to their notice, so making their offense to abound? (Rom. 5: 20.) Why preach the gospel to them, implying that they are sinners? Why send missionaries to the ignorant heathen?

But our Sabbatarian brethren who have entered into Sabbath-breaking partnerships, do (in effect) say to their associates:—"Your refusal to keep holy the seventh day of the week is not sin. Your prosecution of business every Sabbath-day is not sin. When you go into the shop, or store, and call all hands to work, post books, and settle accounts, and keep the noise and turmoil of business going all the sacred hours of the Sabbath, you commit no sin, notwithstanding God says, Thou shalt not do any work—thou nor thy servant. You are committing no transgression of the divine law in all this, because you do not know that you are! And we are determined not to tell you that you are, for it is much better for our reputation as Christians, seeing we are associated with you, that your course should seem consistent with the strictest regard for righteousness. We will, therefore, by our continuance in partnership with you and by our willingness to share in all the gains that may be acquired by the business of the Sabbath, give you to infer that we do not object to the thing, nor regard it as a breach of the Fourth Commandment. What renders us the more willing to do this is, that your course is held in esteem among men, while ours is rather looked down upon. You, by keeping Sunday, honor a human tradition, which, in the eyes of men, gives you a better standing for piety than if you kept what God requires of you. We will not, therefore, bear any emphatic testimony against your practice, farther than to occasionally suggest, in a modest way, that we differ from you in opinion, and to absent ourselves from the shop, or store, on the seventh day." Such is, to all intents, the language of the practice of our brethren associated in business with those who keep the first day of the week.

How long will our brethren be content to bear such contradictious testimony? At one time, they say that the refusal of men to keep holy the seventh day of the week is sin. At another, they hardly dare utter such a sentiment. In their church relations, they proclaim that there is no other Sabbath but the seventh day, and that God will accept no other observance in place of it. In their business relations, they are ready to endorse the popular sentiment. When will they learn that even in their business they must glorify God?

T. B. B.

KANSAS—NEBRASKA.

There is, at present, much significancy clustering around these names. Important interests of liberty are connected with them. They have become the national watchword in the great battle between right and wrong, truth and error, freedom and oppression. Propagandism has inscribed them upon its ensigns, and marched to its aggressions. The first battle has been fought, and truth and freedom have again been made to bite the dust. The United States Senate, which ought to be the great embodiment of the world's freedom and progress, is again servilely crawling at the feet of Slavery, licking the dust from its sandals, and wiping them with the hair of its head.

Thus has it long been in the contests between freedom and slavery. Nothing remarkably new has happened. In the founding of our Government, slavery was emphatically sectional—liberty national. It was the policy of the great and wise fathers of the Republic, to restrict the sectional, and to foster and extend the national principle. When Washington entered upon his duties as President of the young Republic, no slave clanked his chain within our territorial domain. All were under State jurisdiction. The great north-western territory had been, by a special ordinance, consecrated forever to freedom. Freedom seemed to grow strong and majestic, and to spread its protecting ægis over the land—slavery seemed to dwindle and wither in the presence of its foe. Results have shown the reality to be quite different from the seeming.

There came a fierce struggle between these opposing powers. Liberty, in his wrestling with Despotism, was like to prevail. In his extremity, Despotism held forth the temptation of a compromise. Liberty accepted it in the simplicity of his heart. An unholy copartnership, under the title of the Missouri Compromise, was formed. Liberty gave up of his broad and free acres all that slavery asked—whereon he might run rampant, and stretch and sun his cramped and galled limbs.

All compromises between truth and error, right and wrong, are to be deprecated. No such union—no such amalgamation—has ever been for the benefit and furtherance of truth and right. The good and true may walk hand in hand, in harmony and innocency—but when they leave their exalted position, and descend to the level of the bad and false, for the sake of union and compromise, the result has ever been disastrous. When truth, in her innocency, has ever given her hand to falsehood in plighted faith, she has ever learned, when too late, that the serpent, as of old, lurked behind the fair words that beguiled. Liberty, in its compromises with slavery, will ever find itself, in the end, humbled and trampled upon. So in the Missouri Compromise, the North, Sampson-like, was shorn of its strength, and with its eyes dug out, it has ever since been serving in the prison-house of the South.

Then came the deeper degradation of the Compromise of 1850. By this act, we were sent as blood-hounds to bay on the track of the fleeing fugitive. True, now and then one has been somewhat restive in the leash. True, for a time there seemed to be a strong and determined voice of remonstrance. But it was like the ravings of a caged lion, beating against the iron bars of his prison. Then followed in quick succession the finality platforms of the two great political parties, framed by the political leaders at the Baltimore Conventions. Presidential aspirants, accompanied by office-seekers of all grades and descriptions, leaped upon the newly-constructed platforms, and bid the "dear people" follow them. What were the dear people to do—what could they do, in such an emergency? It is very true, that many of them had spoken out in loud protestations against the enormity of the measures respecting which their party leaders now commanded them to seal their mouths evermore. Many had sworn allegiance to a higher law. Many had prayed that the unrighteous enactment might be blotted from our national statutes, and had vowed to Heaven, never to cease their warnings, as long as breath was spared them. Notwithstanding all this, when they heard again the sweet and inviting voices of their dear old party leaders calling to them, and saw their benignant smiles and winning gestures, beckoning them forward—and when they remembered, withal, how disinterested these leaders were, is it surprising that they felt once more old party ties gently entwining around their hearts and drawing them lovingly towards their leaders? Is it surprising that their prayers, their vows, their higher law consciences, their loud protestations, were all forgotten, and they found themselves almost unawares scrambling for a place on the platform beside their old leaders? Yes, this was somewhat surprising, to any one having any faith in humanity—yet so it was. But the "unkindest cut" of all this has been in the fact that as soon as the dear people had fairly seated themselves upon these platforms, and begun pleasantly to smoke the pipe of peace, and just as the heavens began to appear clear and serene after the recent storms, with no horoscope to indicate the impending danger, the party leaders should play Guy Fawkes, and touch off the concealed magazines, and send the unsuspecting people and their platforms whirling in every direction. This has been most effectually done by the Nebraska Bill, whether it pass other than the Senate or not. And the people are beginning to look about them in amazement at the utter ruin that has been so soon made of all their schemes and prospects of peace and finalities. They affirm, that it is unkind, ungenerous, unjust, nefarious, in Douglass and Co., thus to treat them—that it is not the legitimate offspring of the compromise of 1850. That it is ungenerous, and all that, none can doubt. Its paternity is equally unmistakable. It is the hag-born offspring of propagandism. Its legitimacy cannot well be questioned.

The territorial organizations proposed in the bill are at present entirely unnecessary. It violates the nation's plighted faith with the Indian. It is a dishonest breach of compact between the North and South. It is very true, that the original compact was an unholy alliance between liberty and slavery. But as all of the unjust part of the compromise has been fulfilled, and fulfilled in such a manner that there is no recalling the transaction, there can be assigned no valid reason why the just and right of the same should not be scrupulously fulfilled. It re-opens, in its fraudful operations, the whole slavery agitation in a most aggravated and fearful form. It opens a broad inviting field on which slavery propagandism may luxuriate and prepare to make new aggressions on liberty. This field comprises an area greater than all of the Free States east of the Rocky Mountains. It haughtily tramples under foot the claims of liberty, humanity and religion. It virtually spreads guilt, degradation, and oppression, over the whole nation. It assumes the responsibility of fixing guilt and degradation upon the institutions and the character of untold millions of human beings of future generations. It broadens and deepens the stain of guilt upon our national escutcheon to such a degree that it cannot be removed save by the most fearful convulsions. The whole scheme is the betrayal of the most sacred trusts voluntarily assumed by our legislators. It is but political gambling for place and office. It shows that our political parties, our politics, our whole national organization, is festering and reeking with corruption. It shows the gradual degeneracy of northern principles and northern spirit. The Missouri Compromise was originated and supported by southern men, and though it asked for but a portion of free territory, with a pledge that the remainder should ever remain sacred to freedom, it met with long, strong, determined opposition from the North, and on its passage, received but four northern votes in the Senate. The present measure, on the other hand, which proposes to give up all that we have to give, has been originated by a northern recreant, and has found most zealous and servile supporters in many others of a like class, and, on its passage through the same body, it has found fourteen northern Senators of spirit sufficiently craven to give it support. And, to complete the humiliation, the whole scheme is backed by a northern President, who is a professed follower of the meek and lowly Jesus.

What will the North do in this renewed and deeper degradation—in this traitorous surrendering of its rights and principles to slave power—this gambling with its dearest interests, for office and emolument. Judging the future from the past, the inevitable conclusion would be, that the North will tamely submit to this new outrage. There may be a short, spasmodic, feverish excitement and opposition—a few quicker and stronger beats of the pulse of humanity, for the insult offered it—to be followed by general apathy and supineness—new finality platforms—new swearing allegiance to old party leaders.

Though such might be the conclusions, reasoning from the past, yet we have strong faith in humanity. We believe that it will, sooner or later, arise and assert its claims. We believe that there is, deep seated in the human heart, a strong and undying love for right, and truth, and freedom, which will ultimately prevail over all obstacles. We believe that > "Truth, crushed to earth, will rise again;

> The eternal years of God are hers."

Whether the glorious period is nigh at hand, when such principles shall prevail, time alone must determine. But however nigh or remote this period may be, there are certain conditions absolutely necessary in ushering it in.

There must be a general laying aside of old party predilections, and a coming up as one man to the battle of right and truth against error and wrong. Our politics must be baptized in religion. The pure principles of the gospel must pervade and control all our political actions. We must vote as we pray—not pray one thing and vote the opposite—not pray, "Lord, thy kingdom come," and vote for the continuance of the kingdom of Satan—pray, "Deliver us from all evil," and vote for the evil from which we wish to be delivered, even if it is the less of two evils. Availability must no longer be the polar star of political action, but we must follow truth, and right, and freedom, "uncaring consequences"—feeling that > "God stands beyond the dim unknown, > Ever keeping watch o'er His own."

When the North shall have the moral courage to do this, unflinchingly, perseveringly, then, and not till then, will she arise from her deep degradation, the dark tide of oppression be staid in its onward flow, and the nation become, indeed, what it professes to be, a light among the nations of the earth. *

But in the education of our children, we must ever bear in mind, that the human character, like the rose, has its odor as well as its color. "A good name is better than precious ointment." Eccl. 7: 1. What are talents, learning, and wealth, without the odor of a good name? The education, therefore, of the heart—the affections—is an indispensable item in the training of our children. The feature of education now under consideration is one to which no limits can be set. It pervades the whole man—is present in all the relations of life—gives character and color to every act—and, like the seal to certain legal instruments, gives force and value to the whole. Indeed, it is that which may be regarded as the real substance of human character. If a man has wealth, but has also a cold and unsympathizing heart, of what value is he to the needy? If one has learning and intellectual ability, but has a coarse and selfish heart, how limited is his field of usefulness, to what it would be had he a generous and truthful heart—one that loved his race! O, what a charm, what a glory, what excellence and real worth, is there in a noble and generous nature—a sympathizing and affectionate heart! How far, indeed, does this excel goodliness of person, or any of those mere accidents of birth or position, which make up so much of human pleasure, and upon which the foot of pride so loftily treads!

Dear parents, will you, then, for a moment, consider how much your child is dependent upon your example and instruction for those excellencies of which we are speaking? If your examples are coarse, selfish, and vulgar—if your conversation is censorious, selfish, or indelicate—how can it be that your children shall be otherwise in theirs? How earnestly, then, should you, for the sake of your children, cultivate all those excellencies of character upon which so much of the happiness and glory of life depend. To whom should your children look, and in whom should they confide, if not in their parents? Please then, as the artist forms in his mind a perfect model after which to fashion the instrument he is making, so form in your mind just such a character as you would wish your child to possess, and then, with humble reliance upon God, patient and untiring effort, address yourself daily and continually to the soul-inspiring and heaven-rewarding labor of forming the character of that cherub upon your knee, after such a pattern, by which you shall not only bring honor to yourself, and peace to your child, but a rich blessing to the world.

COMMUNION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In order to examine the subject of communion, it should be viewed from the stand-point of its origin, rather than from its modern sectarianism. And I am well aware of the difficulty there will be in divesting it of those sectarian associations, by which its original character has been nearly lost sight of. Let us, then, go back to that upper chamber in Jerusalem where the Lord's Supper was instituted.

As members of the Jewish Church, Christ and twelve of his disciples had assembled for the purpose of celebrating the Passover, an annual feast of the nation, commemorating their deliverance from a cruel bondage of some centuries. At the close of this feast, and ere they had left their seats around the table, Jesus took some of the remaining bread and wine, and requested the little company to eat and drink again in remembrance of him. How simple, and yet how significant, was that act! They had just ate and drank in memory of the deliverance of their ancestors from a temporal bondage; they were now again to eat and drink in memory of a spiritual deliverance which Christ was to accomplish for them and the world.

Now, who were the rightful and proper communicants of the Passover. Every member of the Jewish Church, that was not ceremonially unfitted for that communion. All such were not only permitted, but required, to commune. And no one had a right to forbid another. And although the Passover Supper was probably eaten generally in small companies, yet all the members of that Church had a right to partake whenever present. And as the Passover was given to the Jewish Church irrespective of its sectarian divisions, so the Lord's Supper was given to the Christian Church irrespective of its sectarian divisions. The Lord's Supper belongs to the Christian Church, which has been delivered from the bondage of sin, and brought into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. All true members of this Church have not only the right and the privilege of eating of this Passover, but it is their duty, because commanded.

So much seems plain from the institution as given and explained by Christ. Let us now examine it in the light of the Apostle Paul's teaching on this point. 1 Cor. 10: 16—"The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" 1 Cor. 11: 24—"Take, eat; this is my body which is broken for you; this do in remembrance of me," (Christ.) Verse 25—"This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me," (Christ.) Here the same great truth is brought to the mind of the communicant, viz. that his eating and drinking is in remembrance of his Redeemer. There is no intimation that his communing was to have any other bearing. No test of any fellowship, except that of Christians with their Saviour—no communion, except that of the blood and body of Christ. There is no intimation of its being a local church ordinance, or that those who communed approved or disapproved of each other's sentiments or practices. It was simply an act of eating and drinking in memory of Jesus Christ. In fact, it is strongly intimated, that to participate in the ordinance from any other reason would be to fail to discern the Lord's body. And farther, each communicant was solemnly to examine himself (not others) directly upon this point. (Verses 24, 29.) Such, to me, seems to be the Lord's Supper, when divested of all the extraneous trappings and appendages hung around it.

I close this article, by saying to "Enquirer," that I think it would not be best for our churches to disband, and their members connect themselves with other societies; not because such connection is forbidden by the nature of the Lord's Supper, but because the truth of the Sabbath can be more efficiently carried out and spread abroad by a concentration of their labors than otherwise. Whether "Enquirer" will continue to have as high an opinion of my judgment as before I answered his question, I cannot say. But as valuable as I esteem the opinion of "Enquirer," or any other brother, I must more highly value my own conviction of truth. For, should I cease to value truth above all price—should I foolishly barter my convictions of truth, right, duty—I should be unworthy the good opinion, not only of "Enquirer," but of every honest man.

Sympathy for the Turks.—An article in one of the daily papers on the present condition of Eastern Affairs—in which, there is every reason to believe, the principal powers of Europe will become involved—speaks in the following strain of the general sympathy for the Turks:—

"In this contest, as far as it has yet been developed, the sympathies of the greater part of Christendom have been bestowed on the Turks, and that for obvious reasons. They are not only the weaker of the two, but are the party attacked, and for the attack no better pretense can be found than that which the wolf alledged against the lamb when he fell upon him for troubling the brook where both were drinking, though the lamb was further down stream, and could not possibly have disturbed the water where his enemy stood. The Czar assails the Sultan in order to secure a guarantee for the rights of the Greek Catholics among the latter's subjects, but refuses to accept a guarantee of the same rights for all the Christians of Turkey, the Greek Catholics included. This naturally draws toward the Turks the good wishes of all who love fair play and honest dealing, and this general current of sympathy is still further increased by the belief that since the time when Mahmoud II. boldly struck out into the path of reform, Turkey has gradually been going through a process of regeneration and assimilation to the civilized and progressive States of Europe."

Sympathy for Fugitives.—A meeting was held at Syracuse, N. Y., March 22d, to express sympathy with the rescuers of Joseph Glover at Milwaukee on the 11th. Not less than six hundred persons were present. Robert M. Richardson, President of the Common Council, presided, assisted by thirteen Vice Presidents. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Richardson, Rev. Mr. May, Rev. Luther Lee, Rev. R. R. Raymond, Rev. L. C. Matlack, Rev. J. W. Loguen, and others. The following is one of the resolutions adopted:—

That the citizens of Syracuse, in the early and triumphant days of the Fugitive Slave law, made one pledge to all the world—and kept it—and that we now offer to join with Milwaukee and Racine, and all our sister cities of the North, in a holy confederacy, which, by all that is venerable in the memory of our fathers, all that is glorious in the structure of our institutions, all that is precious in the reputation of our country, all that is imperative in the claims of humanity, all that is solemn in the commandments of God, shall swear that no friendless and broken-hearted fugitive shall ever again be consigned to Slavery from the North, under the accursed act of 1850.

The Nebraska Bill has received a stunning blow—probably its death blow—in the House of Representatives. Having been reported from the majority of the Committee on Territories, with a recommendation that it do pass, it was, by a vote of 110 to 95, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union. Of course it must now wait its turn, and that turn will probably not come for four weeks yet. Meanwhile a continuance of public meetings and petitions will doubtless convince Congress that the people are not quite ready for the monster iniquity.

Education in Louisiana.—The State Superintendent has recently visited the schools in all parts of the State of Louisiana, with a view of learning their precise condition, and being able to recommend methods of improvement. The following extract from his Report shows a state of things which is disgraceful to Louisiana, and could exist only where slavery exists:—

"A local, parochial and State supervision of the schools, is what is most needed. There should be, in every parish, a Board of Examiners, consisting of three or more, whose duty it should be to examine applicants for the situation of teacher. In some districts the directors are totally incapable of performing this duty, for the very potent reason, that they themselves do not know how to read or write. In looking over the warrants of teachers on file in this office, there were found in one parish the ordinary mark of twelve different directors; in two or three of the districts, there were two out of three who signed their mark. This is truly a deplorable fact, and one which unprincipled teachers have not failed to turn to their own pecuniary advantage. Two out of every three of the Directors should be required to know how to read and write!"

Romanism in England.—Some of the clergymen of the English Church who have recently crossed the imaginary line which divides that church from the Romish, prove to be among the most bitter haters of Protestantism. One of them, Rev. J. Oakley, after saying mass at Islington, near London, gave the people a long lecture for sending their children to the Protestant schools, and having done so, he uttered the following denunciation:—

"We hereby give notice, that if any persons, after this our solemn warning, do send their children to the Protestant schools, (six schools were here named,) or, if they having been already tempted to send them, do not instantly remove them, they shall be counted guilty of mortal sin; shall be refused all the rites and sacraments of the Church; at death, the extreme unction shall be denied to them, and their bodies, either his or hers, refused burial in any cemetery belonging to the Church. The curse of God shall rest upon them, body and soul, living or dead."

Manners of the Scotch.—A writer in the American Messenger communicates to the readers of that widely circulated journal the impressions produced by a residence of six weeks in Scotland. In relation to the manners of the Scotch, we have the following:—

"The manners of the Scotch have little of the grace and ease of the French, less warmth than the German or the Irish, less frankness than the American. 'Mind your own business, and leave me to mine,' is the ungenial tone of the peasant's stiff stride as he passes you on the highway, without curiosity enough to gaze at you, or courtesy enough to bow. And there is something of this tone in the air of the more cultivated classes, till a suitable introduction, or a friendly approach, thaws the ice of caution. But then, when assured that confidence is safe, and that the salt of hospitality will not be wasted, there is no limit to the kind attentions lavished on the acknowledged friend or guest. Especially is this true of Christian circles.

Kentucky Slaves in Canada.—The Cincinnati Commercial says that Rev. H. H. Hawkins, a colored preacher, who was formerly a slave of Gen. Taylor, of Newport, Ky., and now resides in Canada, states that there resides in Canada West 400 slaves who absconded from masters living in Kentucky, within a hundred miles of Cincinnati. There are in Canada 35,000 fugitive slaves, who are in a very flourishing condition just now, owing to the high prices paid for railway labor in the Provinces. In the town of Chatham 730 fugitives are settled. In the new town of Buxton, 130 families of escaped slaves are settled, who own, all together, a tract of nine thousand acres of land. The whole amount of land in Canada West owned by fugitive slaves is 25,000 acres.

Prohibitory Liquor Law in Pennsylvania.—On the 22d of March, the Pennsylvania House of Representatives passed a Prohibitory Liquor Law. The first section of the bill authorizes the people, on the second Tuesday of October next—the day of the general election—to vote for or against the bill, which contains all the provisions necessary to give it force, if it be enacted into a law. The vote of the people, whether favorable or unfavorable, is to be considered the prayer of the people; and the next Legislature will be expected to act in according with it.

The Liquor Law in New York.—It is decided, that New York is to have a Prohibitory Liquor Law. For two weeks past the attention of the Legislature has been for the most part occupied with this subject. That the people desired the law, was admitted; but the trouble was for its friends to agree when it should go into operation. The first of December next was agreed upon as the time for it to take effect. The vote of the Assembly was 77 ayes to 26 noes. The general features of the law we have already printed.

Disbanding of Churches.—An orthodox Congregational Church is Boston, known as the Edwards Church, disbanded a short time ago. The circumstance led a correspondent of the Independent to make inquiries whether other orthodox churches in Boston, and how many, had been disbanded. He found that within twenty years, seven congregational churches, which flourished for a longer or shorter period, had ceased to exist. He also expresses the opinion, that similar changes have been as numerous among other denominations.

Religious Interest at Alfred.—Since the dedication of the new meeting-house at Alfred Center, the church has held a series of interesting meetings, among the results of which we hear that twenty-five persons have been added to the church, twenty-one of whom were baptized.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

An anti-smoker authorizes the editor of one of our religious papers to say to the students of the Theological Seminary of New Brunswick, that every student who, from the receipt of notice, will abstain entirely from the use of tobacco in all its forms, viz: smoking, chewing, and snuffing, and will pledge himself to refrain from its use, shall, at the time he receives his professional certificate, be furnished with an order upon Robert Carter for fifty dollars' worth of books.

The Newark Mercury remarks, that an increasing interest in the cause of sound education is manifesting itself throughout New Jersey. No question of such transcendant importance now agitates the public mind as this: How shall our Common School system be improved and perfected? On this question the people are becoming aroused; the Legislature has felt it, and done something to meet its responsibilities to the State and world.

The late James P. Vanhorn, of this city, left the following legacies: New York Orphan Asylum, $15,000; New York Orphan Asylum, after the death of his widow, $20,000; New York Protestant Episcopal Bible and Prayer Book Society, $20,000; New York Protestant Episcopal Missions, $15,000. The American Bible Society are made the residuary legatees, the amount of which is estimated at $150,000.

At a recent meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York, the subject of a permanent location was discussed. That the Society should have rooms of its own was deemed by some almost, if not quite, essential to its well-being and prosperity; and the proposition was entertained to raise $50,000 for the purpose.

The Worcester Spy states that Ichabod Washburn, of that city, is about to erect, at his own expense, a substantial brick chapel, for the free use of the public for religious worship. The building is to be forty feet by eighty feet; and in one portion of it there is to be a dwelling-house for the minister-at-large, who is to be supported by the evangelical churches of the city.

The Western Christian Advocate states that the brethren of the Union Chapel, Cincinnati, have determined to support a missionary to Rome. He is to go as an American citizen and a Protestant missionary, claiming to exercise the proper functions of his ministerial office. They have selected their man, and await the action of the Missionary Society and the Bishop.

We learn from one of the New York daily papers, that the Rev. Isaac D. Westcott (Baptist) and the Rev. Thomas J. Sawyer (Universalist) have agreed to discuss the question of Endless Misery as opposed to ultimate Universal Salvation, at the Tabernacle, for six evenings, each speaking twenty minutes alternately.

Rev. Dr. Maclay is engaged in the effort of raising a theological endowment for Madison University. The amount needed is thirty thousand dollars. The New York Chronicle publishes a statement, from which it appears that about one half this amount has been subscribed and pledged. Twelve men give a thousand dollars each.

The Directors of the Providence and Worcester Railroad have passed a vote that all the settled clergymen residing on the line of the Road, including those at Providence and Worcester, be furnished with free passes over the road the ensuing year. We hope this example may prove contagious.

Intelligence has come to hand from France, that new invasions of religious liberty had awakened alarm among Protestants, several chapels having been closed under cover of the decree of March, 1852, originally aimed at political gatherings.

The American and Foreign Christian Union have in press a work, which its officers speak of in the highest terms, the prize essay, by Rev. Robert Gault, of Scotland, entitled, "Popery, the Man of Sin and Son of Perdition."

Rev. W. S. Loyd, the pastor of two Baptist churches a few miles west of Montgomery, Ala., died on Sunday last while performing service. He had commenced his discourse, and after speaking a few moments, exclaimed: "I feel, brethren, I am giving," and instantaneously sank down and expired.

It is now nearly three years since the model act of prohibition—the glorious MAINE LAW—was adopted. Since then, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota have each passed acts contemplating the same end.

Rev. P. Mason, city missionary in Boston, stated, as a fact that should startle us into redoubled activity in our missionary work, that a few days since, on visiting the House of Correction in South Boston, out of forty boys confined there for crime, but two were from under Protestant influence; the remaining thirty-eight were Catholics.

The "Old Chief," Rev. J. B. Finley, is preparing a work entitled "Memorials of Western Methodism," embracing historical and biographical sketches. It will be the beginning of a complete history of Methodism in the West, and will illustrate the life and times of the earliest pioneers.

Rev. H. S. Spencer, a highly respectable clergyman of the Baptist denomination, committed suicide in the Insane Asylum at Utica, New York, on the 26th ult. He had been in the Asylum some months.

The Glasgow Bible Society have, it is stated, resolved on raising a fund for giving the whole Bible to the Chinese, the New Testament fund being understood to be now secured.

In Connecticut, the Governor has appointed Friday, the 17th day of April, to be observed as a day of fasting and prayer.

EDUCATION IN KENTUCKY.—A writer in the Western School Journal writes from Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 15:—

"We have searched the capital of Kentucky in vain for a public school. Education in this city is exclusively a private or charitable enterprise. The capital is now filled with the representatives of an enlightened and free people, and still no system for the education of youth gladdens the eye of these law-makers. A former legislature passed a law that the common schools of the State should be free, and withheld the means of making them so for two months in the year. Frankfort seems to have imbibed the same spirit, and as a municipality manifests no desire for the education of her children. Private enterprise provides the facilities of education for those able to pay for them, and the charity of the several churches hands down the means of education to the poor, if they will accept the boon."

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 20.

In the SENATE, there came a perfect shower of remonstrances from all quarters against the Nebraska iniquity. Mr. Badger explained the intent of his amendment providing against the revival of the Louisiana slave laws. Other Senators explained their views, and so the whole session was spent in talk about a bill at present beyond their jurisdiction.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Bocock, from the Naval Committee, reported a joint resolution relative to the bids for provisions, clothing and small stores for the use of the Navy. It provides that all bids may be rejected, at the option of the Department, if the persons offering are not known as manufacturers of or regular dealers in the articles. After some debate, the resolution was adopted. The first week in May was set apart for business relating to organization of Territorial Governments, (Nebraska and Kanzas.) A resolution was adopted directing a rigid inquiry into the manner in which Secretary Davis has managed the financial affairs of the War Department. An ineffectual attempt was made by Mr. Benson to reduce ocean postage to the uniform charge of two cents. Mr. Wentworth introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating our reciprocity treaties of commerce in certain cases, (Spain of course meant.)

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 21.

In the SENATE, Mr. Fish presented the memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce, praying for the establishment of Naval Schools for the preparation of youths as seamen. Numerous memorials denouncing the repeal of the Missouri Compromise were presented. Resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois were presented in favor of granting lands for a ship canal around Niagara Falls; also, one for restricting the duties on sugar, molasses and railroad iron. The joint resolution from the House, giving the Navy Department power to reject certain bids for supplying provisions, clothing and small stores for the use of the Navy, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The bill to increase the pay and otherwise promote the efficiency of the Army, was then taken up, when a warm debate ensued on the clause giving the appointment of a cadet to each Senator, and without taking a vote on the subject it was postponed.

In the HOUSE, a resolution was adopted authorizing the printing of 100,000 copies of the Agricultural part of the Patent Office Report for the use of the members of the House, and 10,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Patents. The Committee on Public Lands reported a bill, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, authorizing Alabama, and other States having Public Lands therein remaining unsold and unappropriated for twenty years, to sell the same for educational purposes and internal improvements. After disposing of several unimportant bills, the Senate Nebraska and Kansas bill was taken up, and after considerable discussion, during which much feeling was manifested, the bill was finally referred to the Committee of the Whole by a vote of 110 to 95.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 22.

In the SENATE, on motion of Mr. Fish, the second Tuesday in April was designated for the consideration of adverse reports from the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Naval Affairs reported back to the Senate the House bill confirming the bids for furnishing provisions, clothing, naval stores, &c., to the United States Navy to manufacturers and dealers, which was debated at considerable length, and finally passed. The bill authorizing Wisconsin to select the residue of land granted to her in 1846, to aid in the improvement of Fox and Wisconsin rivers, was passed; the bill granting lands to Illinois and Indiana Central Railroad, was also passed. The bill increasing the pay of the rank and file of the army and for other purposes was passed.

The HOUSE, after the transaction of the usual opening business, resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of settlers upon lands reserved for railroad purposes, which, after considerable debate, was passed. The bill, as passed, provides that settlers shall have the right to preëmpt lands at $1 25 per acre. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation bill, but without taking the question the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 23.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hunter reported back the Deficiency Appropriation bill with numerous amendments. The consideration of the bill was postponed, and after a short executive session, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the bill passed by the Senate providing for the purchase of more suitable places for the Post-Office and United States Courts in the City of Philadelphia, was taken up, and after a brief debate, the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill passed by the Senate in favor of extending the warehousing system, was then taken up and discussed, but without coming to any definite action on the subject, the House went into Committee of the Whole and resumed the consideration of the Indian Appropriation bill. Mr. Milson of Virginia, then made a speech in favor of the Nebraska bill. Mr. Hunt, of Louisiana, followed in opposition to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 24.

In the SENATE, no business of public interest was transacted, the day being devoted to the consideration of bills on the private calendar. Adjourned over until Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the Senate bill extending the warehouse system, by establishing private bonded warehouses, was amended and passed. The Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Arnold, deceased, to extend for fourteen years the patent for making cloth without spinning and weaving the raw material, was passed. The House then went into Committee of the Whole and resumed the consideration of the Indian Appropriation bill, and after a brief discussion the committee rose and reported the bill. The House then adjourned till Second-day.

European News.

We have four days later news from Europe.

The intelligence does not change materially the warlike aspect of affairs. There is a report of the capture of Kalafat by the Russians, and the massacre of the Turks therein. But as this is but report thus far, we have nothing in the way of positive war progress to add to the previous advices.

On the 17th of February a conflict took place by mistake between two columns of the Russian army. The Turkish positions are extended in an easterly direction as far as the village of Cuiperceni, which is about a mile distant from Kalafat. For several days a Turkish corps 4,000 strong, under the command of Col. Mirolai, had been posted in front of this village and in the direction of the Russian outposts. On this corps the Russians determined to make an onslaught during the night of the 16th. For this purpose two Russian columns were brought up, each from 4,000 to 5,000 strong, one by the road which leads to Kalafat from about the village of Scriberzi, and the other from the left side of it from about Poisna, to advance unexpectedly upon the Turks, to surprise, inclose them, and cut them to pieces. The Russian columns commenced their march at 3 o'clock in the morning, and by 4 o'clock reached a position from whence they were only half an hour's march from the Turkish pickets. The second column seems either to have missed the direction by mistaking the road, or to have come up long after its time. Be this as it may, the latter column, in the obscurity of a foggy night, concluded the former one to be a body of hostile Turks, and instantly opened upon them a terrific cannonade, which the others, who labored under the same mistake, returned with yet more deadly effect. Pressing toward each other, it came ere long to a close fire of small arms. This ill-omened combat lasted for an hour and a half, until, when day dawned, the combatants saw with horror the error they had committed. The loss in killed and wounded in the course of the night's encounter is reckoned, by the Russians themselves, at several hundreds.

During a ball given by the French Ambassador at Pera, a barbarous murder was perpetrated within a few doors of the spot. Mons. Perrei, a French merchant, went to the ball, leaving his wife at home sick. During his absence, three men entered the house, robbed it, and stabbed Madame Perrei fatally, and wounded the maid-servant, who screamed for assistance. On leaving, the ruffians appear to have quarreled among themselves, for the corpse of one of them was found close at hand, with a knife in his heart. The deceased robber appeared to have been an Italian.

Napoleon, on Sunday, March 5th, reviewed some battalions of Chasseurs of Vincennes who are under orders for the East. He was cordially received by the crowd, and, it was observed, seemed in particularly good spirits. The Eastern question has, on the whole, increased the popularity of the Emperor. The Duke of Saxe Coburg, Prince Albert's brother, had been Napoleon's guest and was present at the review.

California News.

The steamer Northern Light, from San Juan, arrived at New York on the 25th inst., with San Francisco dates to March 1st. She brought 382 passengers, with $615,000 on freight, and $200,000 or $300,000 in the hands of passengers.

The advices by this arrival are very favorable as regards the mines, but unfavorable in regard to the prospects of trade. There was rather more demand for merchandize from the interior, but nearly every article was in overstock. Considerable re-shipments were being made to the Atlantic ports.

The weather has not at any time since the discovery of gold been so favorable for mining as during the last month, and there probably was never comparatively so large an amount of gold dug.

A bill similar to the Maine Liquor Law has been introduced into the California Legislature.

By the news from Lower California we learn that President Walker's fillibustering arrangements are at an end. On the 14th he spiked and buried his guns and started for San Tomas with 140 men and one field piece. Five of his party severely wounded, and four sick, were left behind, who probable would have been murdered but that they were taken aboard the Columbus and brought to San Diego. It was reported that Malendrez with a force of 300 men would attack Walker on his march.

Lynch Law is popular in California in these days, as will be seen by the following paragraph:—

A man named George Taylor killed an Indian in Indian Valley, without provocation; whereupon Judge Lynch summoned a jury, and tried, convicted, sentenced and forthwith hung Taylor.

On the 17th, an old man named Nathan Pratt was murdered in Mariposa County, by three Mexicans and a Chilean, whose only purpose was robbery. When the neighbors heard of it on the 18th, they immediately turned out, and soon arrested a Mexican who confessed his participation, and gave all the details and the names of his accomplices. He was straightway taken to Pratt's cabin and hung upon the limb of a tree. The party then started to Bear Valley for the others, but found only the Chilean, whom they were about to arrest, when the whole Spanish population in the neighborhood turned out in arms, and determined that the Chilean should not be taken except by due course of law. The Spaniards were in the majority, and had their way until a messenger went over to Quartzburg and drummed up forty armed volunteers, who arrived in a couple of hours and gave the preponderance to the Lynch party, who then conveyed him to Pratt's cabin and hung him upon the same tree with his accomplice. Pratt was 50 years of age, a native of Maine, and had lived in Rhode Island.

ORIGIN OF STONE SPLITTING.—Asa Parker, deacon of the Second church of Boxford, died 1820, aged 90. Having engaged to stone a cellar for a blacksmith in Boxford, and thinking it possible to split stones with wedges, he proposed to the blacksmith to prepare some wedges and cases, and assist in making the experiment. They first tried upon a stone about the size of a half bushel measure, and succeeded; they tried a larger stone with equal success. This took place about 1783, and is supposed to be the first attempt at splitting stones. The business of splitting and hammering stones soon engaged the attention of others, and has become a useful and lucrative employment.

Some interesting experiments have recently been made at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, England, with respect to the power required by an organ to fill the building, and a report has been presented to the Directors on the subject. As the central transept alone covers a larger area than is occupied by the cathedral at York, some idea of the vast size and power of an instrument which should be heard in all parts of the building may be formed. The Committee report that the area required for the instrument, would not be less than 5,400 feet, the depth of the organ 50 feet, and its altitude from the ground, 140 feet. The cost would not be less than £25,000, and its construction would extend over a period of three years.

SUMMARY.

By telegraphic dispatches from New Orleans, we learn that the United States arrived at that port, bringing dates from San Francisco to the 1st inst., two weeks later than previous advices. The news presents no features of importance, local topics mostly occupying public attention. Business prospects had somewhat improved, and prices for the leading articles were tending upward, although the markets generally are represented as being still very depressed. The news from the mines continues favorable. The accounts from Walkers' Sonora expedition are to the 15th of Feb. The captain had broken up his camp at Ensenada and marched southward with about 150 men and one field-piece, leaving behind him a number of sick and wounded, having abandoned all hopes of success.

The Buffalo Republic mentions the appearance in that city of counterfeit gold dollars, which proves that the bogus mint is in operation, and its issues are circulating. The metal of which it is made is copper. A very thin covering of gold, which conceals the baser metal, was probably put on by galvanism. The gold had been removed from the edge of this specimen, and the copper stood confessed. The thickness of it is the same as the genuine, but it is a very little too large in diameter to go into the test mold which they have in the Post-Office. The gold covering, though thin, is sufficient to resist the action of nitric acid, without scratching.

The St. Louis Evening News publishes a list of the principal steamboat casualties which have occurred on the Western waters during the months of January and February just passed. It shows that twenty-three steamers have been sunk, burned or blown up upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and two destroyed by fire on the Savannah, within the time mentioned, and have involved the loss of between one hundred and seventy-five and two hundred lives and over one million dollars worth of property.

The prospect of a peach crop in Massachusetts, the coming season, is but small, most of the buds having been injured by the excessive cold of the past winter. To judge from present indications, however, other kinds of fruit, such as apples, pears, plums and cherries will be abundant; though it is not unlikely that many apple orchards in the neighborhood of Boston will be ravaged as they were the past season by the canker worm.

During the past three days, says the St. Louis Republican, a large number of persons have arrived in this city from various quarters on their way to Nebraska Territory; and as but few boats were in port for Missouri River, they have been compelled to wait for boats to get ready to start. So great is the rush for passage, that although there are several boats in port, their cabins are full, even before they are advertised to leave.

A law case has just been decided in the Supreme Court, which is remarkable from the heavy amount of the verdict rendered. The Western Vermont Railroad Company was sued by Bayley, Brothers & Co., an English house, to recover the value of some five thousand tons of railroad iron. The iron did not arrive at the time stipulated, and the Company received it under protest, and afterward refused to pay. The Jury found for the plaintiffs in ninety-four thousand six hundred and thirty-six dollars damages.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Wednesday, March 22, 1854, says: A fearful accident occurred yesterday on the mountain track of the Virginia Central Railroad. A car containing forty passengers broke loose and descended at a rapid rate; it finally came in collision with the engine and was smashed to pieces, but strange to say only one man was seriously injured, the others sustaining but slight bruises.

It is proposed to build a line of railway from Quebec to Lake St. John, at the head of the Saguenay River. This lake is about 600 square miles in extent, its shores abounding in the most valuable timber. It lies due north from Quebec, distance from it about 108 miles in an air-line, and about 130 by the most direct practicable railway route.

The New Jersey Legislature has passed a law chartering a company to construct a railroad from Camden to Keyport, which will be in a straight line from Philadelphia to New York. The road will pass through Mount Holly, New Egypt and Freehold, to Keyport. Another road is also chartered to run from Keyport to Tom's River, and thence to Delaware Bay and Cape May.

The amount of school money to be distributed by the State of Wisconsin this year among the several counties is $99,749 52. Milwaukee Co. takes the largest share, $9,128 88; Dane, Rock and Dodge are next in order, having respectively $6,567 12, $6,320 88, and $6,212 16. The three counties lowest in the scale are Marathon, $23 04; Polk, $51 12; Pierce, $70 56.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser says: "It is probable the canals will not be opened before the first of May, as the great quantity of frost remaining in the ground, in consequence of the very little snow that fell during the past season, renders it impracticable to open them before that date."

Abingdon, Va., was visited by a terrific storm of hail, rain and wind on Thursday, 16th inst. The Democrat states that some of the lumps of hail were as large as walnuts, destroying nearly every pane of glass in the town exposed on the north and west sides of the houses. At least 10,000 panes of glass were shivered in the town of Abingdon.

An extensive bed of porcelain clay has been discovered on the North Carolina Central Railroad, a few miles below Neuse river. While it is a serious obstacle to laying the rails, being so soft that the timbers laid upon it soon sink out of sight, it may prove to be a valuable discovery. In a cut on the same road, near Mount Moriah, a bed of magnesia has been discovered.

It is ascertained that there is more insanity in California than in any other State of this Union, in proportion to its population. This ought to be expected, from the very nature of the pursuits that lead men thither—the eager hope of sudden wealth, and the disappointments, reverses, and depressions so often experienced.

There is a proposition to coin a new description of cent. It is to be of white metal, resembling silver in appearance, with a round and slightly raised edge. It is about eight-tenths of an inch in diameter, larger than a quarter eagle, and less than a twenty-five cent piece. There is not to be any hole in the coin.

According to a Congressional report recently made, the number of passengers that arrived at the ports of the United States in 1853 was 400,777, which were divided as follows: New York, 294,818; Louisana, 43,020; Massachusetts, 25,929; Pennsylvania, 19,211; Maryland, 11,368; Other ports, 6,423—total, 400,777.

The large rhinoceros which has for some time past been exhibited at Driesbach's Menagerie, Broadway, New York, died one day last week. The animal had been eating hay all night, and at 5 o'clock in the morning laid down and expired in five minutes. This Rhinoceros was the only one in the country, and was valued at $10,000.

E. H. Kimball, of No. 49 Wall st., has just sent home from England and France, a choice lot of Merino Sheep, and the most choice Poultry he could select, for his farm in Brooklyn, for which he received the gold medal of the American Institute, awarded for the best cultivated farm in 1852.

An application has been made to the Minnesota Legislature to incorporate a railroad company, with a capital of $10,000,000, to construct a road from "Fond du Lac, Minnesota, on Lake Superior, by the way of St. Paul, in Minnesota, to a point on the southern boundary line of the State of Iowa."

There was a great flood in the Licking Valley, Indiana, on Thursday last, caused by the rising of the Licking River. Houses were carried away, whole farms submerged, fencing, produce and lumber carried off, &c. The Posey Co. (Ind.) News estimates the damage to $1,000,000.

The Hon. Selah R. Hobbie, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, died in the City of Washington on the 23d inst., of a pulmonary complaint, which had long affected him. Maj. H. was born at Newburgh, New York, on the 10th March, 1797, and died at the age of 57.

Eighty hens, belonging to Capt. Thos. A. Norton, of Yarmouth, Mass., have laid during the year past six hundred and thirty-seven dozen eggs. At the average price of eggs, that would be about one dollar and a quarter for each hen.

At Lewes, March 21, a boat belonging to the wrecking schr. Champion, containing four men, was upset, and Capt. Wm Hutchins, late of the steam-tug America, Capt. Charles Roe and Martin Welsh were drowned.

It seems from a statement in the Milwaukee Sentinel, that there are two more newspapers published in the State of Wisconsin than in Michigan. In the latter State there are 83 papers, in the former 85.

Castle Garden, New York, was leased the other day to Theodore J. Allen, Esq., for five years, at $10,000 per year. The lease just expired was $2,000 per year.

Clothing Establishment.
THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,
For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.
THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation; and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.
Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.
By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Lines.

The Louisville Journal says—"We defy any tasteful lover of poetry to read the following without exclaiming, How very beautiful!"

My soul thy sacred image keeps,
My midnight dreams are all of thee;
For nature then in quiet sleeps,
And silence broods o'er land and sea;
Oh, in that still, mysterious hour,
How oft from waking dreams I start,
To find thee but a fancy flower,
Thou cherished idol of my heart.
Thou hast each thought and dream of mine—
Have I in turn one thought of thine?

Forever thine my dreams will be,
Whate'er may be my fortunes here,
I ask not love—I claim from thee
One only boon, a gentle tear;
May blessed visions from above
Play brightly round thy happy heart,
And may the beams of peace and love
Ne'er from thy glowing soul depart.
Farewell! my dreams are still of thee—
Hast thou one tender thought of me?

My joys like summer birds may fly,
My hopes like summer blooms depart,
But there's one flower that cannot die,
Thy holy memory in my heart;
No dews that one flower's cup may fill,
No sunlight to its leaves be given,
But it will live and flourish still,
As deathless as a thing of heaven.
My soul greets thine, unasked, unsought—
Hast thou for me one gentle thought?

Farewell! farewell! my far-off friend!
Between us, broad, blue rivers flow,
And forests wave, and plains extend,
And mountains in the sunlight glow;
The wind that breathes upon thy brow
Is not the wind that breathes on mine,
The star-beams shining on thee now
Are not the beams on me that shine,
But memory's spell is with me yet—
Canst thou the holy past forget?

The bitter tears that thou and I
May shed whene'er by anguish bowed,
Exhaled into the noontide sky,
May meet and mingle in the cloud;
And thus, my much-loved friend, though we
Far far apart must live and move,
Our souls, when God shall set them free,
Can mingle in a world of love.
This were an ecstacy to me—
Say—would it be a joy to thee?

The Paris Flower Market.

Dr. Choules, in his recent interesting work, "The Narrative of the Excursion of the Vanderbilt Party, in the Steam Yacht North Star," speaks in glowing terms of the great Flower Markets in the French metropolis, and of their influence upon the masses. After a visit to the Quai Defraix, he says:

It is a pleasant thing to see the almost universal passion which exists for flowers. Go through the narrowest streets of Paris, and at the windows of the poorest houses, and up four and five stories, you will see pots of green things and gay, blooming flowers. I like to watch the faces of the country people who bring in the flowers—and they are here by hundreds; they seem to be alive to the beauties of nature; they look as though they had gained some refinement from their gazing on these faint reflections of uncreated excellence and beauty. And then I was delighted to see the feeling of content and pride with which a man in blouse, or a hard-working woman, or a poor little child, would carry off a pot of some verdant thing, to make home look a little more bright and cheerful. These flower markets are pretty things, and they are good things, too. Bad people do not love God's handiworks, and seldom do they care for plants and flowers. I wish that parents would cultivate the taste for beauty and the love of nature in their children. A good flower and a fine plant are far better presents for a child than a noisy drum, a cruel sword, and a miniature gun. Passive impressions lead to active habits, and many a fond but foolish mother has contributed her aid to make her darling boy food for bullets.

Practical Hints about Poultry.

At the present time the subject of poultry is attracting a large share of public attention. The "hen fever" prevails extensively. Public exhibitions are taking place in different places, and accounts of sales at most extravagant prices are published.

Whether the large-sized varieties of fowls, which are "all the rage" now amongst fancy breeders and dealers, are really preferable to the old-fashioned barn-yard fowls, is a subject on which there are two opinions among those who have tried both. To say nothing of the enormous prices which they occasionally command—when fools can be found to pay such prices—they weigh heavily in the market scales, or fill a large platter on the dinner table. But, on the other hand, they are great gormandizers themselves, and the chickens are generally considered difficult to raise.

But it is not our purpose to enter upon a comparison of the different varieties of fowls, so much as to throw out a few hints which may be of value to keepers of any and every variety.

In the first place, roosters should be changed as often as once in two years, if not annually; and pains should be taken, in replacing them, to procure strong, healthy, and perfect birds. The hens will lay better and hatch more chickens.

Secondly, but a small number of hens should be kept in one house, or together. We have known repeated instances in which keepers of poultry have become disgusted at their failure to lay, and have determined to kill them off. They have commenced reducing the number, which was, perhaps, forty or fifty, and, when they got down to half a dozen, were surprised to find every one of the hens laying, and the supply of eggs for the family better than the whole number furnished.

As to profit, we doubt very much whether, if all their food be bought, the eggs and chickens produced by any breed, and sold at the regular market prices, for the table, will pay the expense of keeping. But it by no means follows from this, that hens are not a source of profit on a farm. They eat much which would otherwise be entirely lost and wasted. And a small patch of buckwheat, sown at a trifling cost, and left on the ground where they can stroll over it, and feed at their pleasure, will keep them as fat as butter.

But the main and most important point to which we wish to call attention in connection with this subject, is the great value of the manure of poultry. The hen roost is the place where most farmers should go for their guano. If obtained there, it will invariably prove of good quality. There need be no fear, for those who get their guano from this source, that it will turn out to be of a spurious importation or of an inferior kind. Then, there are no heavy bills to pay for it. The bills of the hens every farmer can provide for, but the bills of the guano dealers not every one is prepared to meet. And we doubt whether even intelligent farmers who have not tried it would estimate at more than one hundredth part of its actual amount, the quantity of excellent manure which can be made, in this way, in the course of the year.

The hen-roost—duck-roost—geese-roost—and turkey-roost—should be supplied with several loads of peet, swamp muck, or loam, spread evenly over the surface of the floor, and on this there should be scattered a thin layer of sand or gravel. Rainy days, when the work can be done as well as not—and as often as practicable—this should be all shoveled over, and the manure thus mixed with the other ingredients. The compost soon becomes strong, when it can be removed, and a fresh supply of the most suitable material convenient to be obtained thrown in.

The house is thus kept sweet, and clean, and healthy, for the fowls, and if any farmer will adopt this plan, and practice it faithfully for five years, and keep an accurate account, not only of the crops raised directly from the compost made with the poultry manure, but from the manure made by feeding those crops out in their turn, he will be amazed at the result; first, in the amount of cash which he will have realized, and secondly, in the effect, in the way of permanent improvement of his farm. Try it. [N. Y. Weekly Post.

Ascent of Mount Popocatapetl.

The following is an extract of a letter published in an English paper, from the Hon. Gerard Noel, M. P., dated Mexico, Jan. 2, 1854, and describing his successful attempt to ascend Popocatapetl in the depth of winter:

"I returned yesterday from an expedition to Popocatapetl, the highest mountain in North America—17,000 feet above the level of the sea. I believe there is no record of an ascent before at this season of the year, although it has been frequently done in May and June. The first night of our ascent we slept at a hut at the line where vegetation ceases and perpetual snow commences, and at 5¼ the next morning we started for the summit, one of the guides leading. At 8 o'clock, I found myself one hundred yards ahead of the rest of the party, (consisting of four,) at 9 out of sight of the party altogether, and at 11 o'clock I reached the crater. The crater is a vast basin, three miles in circumference and 900 feet deep; in some parts perpendicular, in others great masses of projecting rock form bold and stupendous outlines, with enormous icicles hanging from every point. The volcano itself has long since ceased to show any signs of eruption. I began to feel very much numbed with the cold, and my eyes suffered a good deal from the glare of the snow. I should have been very glad of something to eat, having had nothing but a cup of coffee and a biscuit before leaving the hut; but the guide who carried the breakfast had remained (the ruffian!) with the others, who had not come up. Having examined the crater for about a quarter of an hour, I told the guide who had persevered with me, to lead the way up to the top. The fellow declared it was impossible; but not intending, as you may imagine, to give it up (having come so far) without any push, I started for the top alone. I was now only able to take three steps at a time without stopping, as my legs began to give way, and I had oppression of the head and chest. A little after 1 P. M. I reached the top, and enjoyed one of the finest views conceivable of the great valley of Mexico, and looking down on the twin volcano (I forget the Mexican name, but in English it means the White Lady, from its top resembling a woman lying in full length,) seemingly miles below me, but actually only about 2,000 feet. The cold was too intense for me to remain more than ten minutes at the top, and I commenced the descent to the crater. By this time the mountain was enveloped in clouds, and I could see nothing distinctly, so I commenced a further descent, and in a few moments came in sight of the pole of Mr. S——e (one of my compagnons de voyage,) and soon after of himself, lying down, black in the face, and wished to be let alone to die. A little lower down I saw Mr. C——d, rolling about like a drunken man, but still, with undoubted pluck, struggling toward the summit at the rate of about a yard in three minutes. However, after a little rest and encouragement, they both rallied, and I returned with them as far as the crater, but no human effort could get them any higher. I attribute my being able to reach the top to my wind; I never felt want of breath at any time, while the others blew like porpoises. In our descent from the crater we encountered the only real danger. At first the snow was good walking, but as we came lower, where the sun makes a sheet of ice of the surface of the snow, it became so slippery that we frequently lost our footing, and if, after a slip, you get so much impetus that you can't stop yourself, the certainty is that you arrive at the bottom in much the same condition as the man who jumped off the monument. At one time I almost gave myself up. However, no accident did happen, though it makes me creep to think of the slide I took. At 5 P. M., with my hands cut to bits, my nails wore to the quick with holding on, I reached the hut, and there got my breakfast, glad to think it was over, as hungry as fourteen hours' abstinence and battling with 17,000 feet of mountain snow and ice could make me. One of my eyes is completely 'bunged up,' the other just enables me to see to write this. My face is a mass of raw flesh and blisters; but I have the satisfaction of having perched upon a higher mountain than exists in Europe, and climbed 2,500 feet nearer heaven than Albert Smith."

Geological Facts.

In a recent outline of the Geology of the Globe, by Hitchcock, the accomplished geologist, some interesting facts are given respecting the extent and inexhaustibility of the coal regions of the globe, particularly those of the United States. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the coal field covers nearly 10,000 square miles. In the south-east part of Massachusetts, and in Rhode Island, is a deposit covering nearly 500 square miles. The great Apalachian coal field, extending from New York to Alabama, is 720 miles in length, and covers nearly 100,000 square miles. The Indiana coal field, 350 miles long, embraces about 55,000 square miles. In Michigan is another, 150 miles long, wich covers 12,000 square miles. The Missouri and Iowa coal fields embrace 50,000 square miles. The grand total in the United States amounts to more than 225,000 square miles. When we think of the immense extent to which the use of steam will hereafter be increased on this continent, in consequence the use of coal, we can form no adequate conception of the future populousness and prosperity of the country. Slavery in Cuba.

The following extract from a private letter, dated Havana, W. I., March 1, 1854, is communicated to the N. Y. Tribune:—

On our arrival at Guiness our first visit was to a sugar estate about three miles from the village. The sugar house is considered one of the best on the Island, and it certainly is a fine establishment, covering as much ground as Polley's distillery at Williamsburgh, N. Y. It contains a large quantity of the most improved French machinery, and two American centrifugal refiners. (I should think it cost from eighty to one hundred thousand dollars.) The estate cannot be less than three miles square, and employs about two hundred slaves. Some of these are Chinese, and some Coolies, but the greater part Africans, all of them in very poor condition and spirits—and well they may, being wrought twenty hours out of twenty-four, and poorly fed twice a day. On inquiring who all this belonged to, I was told that the former owner died in New York last year, and his widow married her own nephew. Only think of this, three miles square of as good soil as any under the sun, and two hundred men, all producing and toiling for the benefit of two such characters as these! And this is but one of the thousands of such cases.

Our next visit was to a small Sugar House further from the village, and on reaching it, being foremost, I jumped off and tied my horse; and, going to the door, I stood as if thunderstruck, until my comrades came rushing up to know if I was sick, or what was the matter. I was not sick; but what a sight! About thirty children, from six to twelve years old, perfectly naked, were busily employed carrying cane to the mill, and driving the oxen; and two old men, who were unable to walk, were sitting feeding the mill; and in the center stood a large, stout negro, with a long cowhide, driving these infants, who were more like skeletons than anything else. Indeed, the looks of their protruding white eyes and teeth, without flesh enough to cover them, I will never forget. Passing through this and entering the Boiling House, we found at work a few old men, scarcely able to crawl, their breasts actually resting on their knees, and only covered with a small blanket tied over their shoulders. The only white man in the place was the sugar boiler, and, bowing to him as politely as my temper would allow, I left the scene, hardly able to convince myself that I had not been dreaming of the regions of the damned.

The Arabs.

Bayard Taylor, in his recent lecture on the Arabs, said:—

"To know the Arabs one must know the East. The intensity of the sunshine is reproduced in the Arab eye—the simoon is a terrible symbol of those gusts of wrath which desolate the human soul. Luxury and indolence are their characteristics as well as fiery tempers, and we are at a loss to reconcile the one with the other. Our sky, bright as it is, is not to be compared with that of the East. After fifty days of desert travel I left it fascinated by the variety of its scenes. In its solitude it resembles the ocean, but it is sweet and refreshing. Providence leaves none of the desert places of the earth without some atoning quality. God has breathed upon the desert this sweet and cleansing breath. I could point out many traits of resemblance between the sailor and the Bedouin. Each are free and roving in their tastes. Among either you will rarely find a coward."

After speaking of the wandering Arabs, as the type of the race, and relating several anecdotes in connection therewith, he continued:—

"Though fierce by nature, and revengeful, the Arab is not cruel or blood thirsty. As a simple enemy, he is chivalrous and humane, but as an avenger he is terrible in the last degree. The meaner crime of stealing is rare among the Arabs, and though it is allowed among some tribes, yet detection is always followed by punishment. Their greatest frailties are cheating and lying; but they seem to look upon these as an amusement. As this propensity is one of the first to strike a stranger, many travelers go home under very erroneous impressions of the people. They lie generally through malice, carelessness, and the natural tendency to exaggerate, which is characteristic of the Arab tongue—and this latter is almost universal. It is a language of roots, and abounds in bold and brilliant images."

Mr. Bodisco's Wife.

From the Boston Transcript.

Mr. Bodisco had always mingled pleasantly with society at Washington, but the tie which connected him most nearly to America, originated in a singular instance of "love at first sight." He was one day walking with a friend towards Georgetown Heights, when he passed a boarding school for young ladies, and when attracted by a fair girl of sixteen, who stood swinging her bag, and talking with animation to some of her companions. "Who is that beautiful girl? Who is she?" eagerly asked he, but his friend could not inform him. The door opened, and in she went to her books and slate; all unconscious of the daguerreotype that glimpse had left on the heart of the grave Russian Minister. The next day, and the day following, saw him taking the same walk, which subsided to a very slow step as he approached the building, and looked earnestly at every door and window. May Day was at hand, and was to be celebrated as usual in the school, by the usual festivities, and the choice of a Queen from among the number; and this year the floral royalty happened to fall on Miss Harriet Williams, the very girl who had so instantly enthroned herself in the admiration of the foreigner.

Just before May Day, the principal was surprised to receive a note from the Russian Envoy at Washington, expressing great interest in education, and begging permission to be present at the festival of May Day, which it would give him particular pleasure, as a stranger to the customs of the country, to witness. Consent, of course, was very graciously granted, and the occasion was as charming as youth and flowers always make it. At the end of the day, Miss Harriet announced that she would not attend school any more. "What! not graduate? oh, why not? Are you going away?" But she shook her head, laughed, and kept her own counsel, and in a few weeks was the wife of the Russian Minister. She has accompanied her husband once or twice to Russia, where she was very much admired, and known as the "American Rose." Her face had regularity of feature, but was particularly distinguished for exquisite coloring. Nothing could surpass the chesnut brown of her hair, the bright grey blue of her eye, nor the hue of the lilly and the rose so delicately blended in her complexion. Although there was a great disparity of years, and a great difference in appearance and character, between herself and husband, it seems to have been a very happy union.

The Halibut Fisheries.

The Boston Traveler says: The Gloucester, Mass, people are prosecuting the halibut fishing on "George's Shoals," this spring, with renewed vigor. There are now about seventy-five sail of vessels engaged in the business, and in a few weeks there will be twice that number. The schooners are clipper-built, from 80 to 100 tuns burden, and carry crews numbering some twelve men each. The halibut are caught on the Shoals about 180 miles from Boston. The depth of water on the Shoals varies from three to twenty fathoms, with a heavy current running. The vessels are anchored with a good scope of cable out. Halibut are caught with a good stout cod line and hook, baited with herring. They vary in weight from 100 to 250 lbs. each. If the fishermen meet with good luck, they can obtain from 12,000 to 20,000 lbs. in 48 hours.

A few years ago most of the vessels, called smacks, had well rooms, to keep the halibut alive for the Boston market. Several built with well rooms were lost on George's, probably by having the well rooms stove in by heavy seas; and since that, this kind of craft are abandoned altogether; and the halibut are now kept on ice, in the hold, each vessel using up several hundred tuns of ice in the course of the season.

The halibut fishery is attended with more danger, hard labor and expense than any other fishing; so much so, that the business is confined to the Gloucester fishermen alone

Some of the Gloucester fishermen have prosecuted the halibut fishery all winter; but the majority do not start until February. There is great danger of anchoring a vessel on the shoals, on account of the coming up suddenly of heavy winds and storms, from which there is often no escape from foundering but by cutting away the cable and running before the gale. Then again, the hull of the vessel is often completely encased with ice, with the sails and rigging in the same condition.

Gloucester has suffered greatly by the loss of life and property in the George's Shoals fishery. There are various opinions in relation to the loss of vessels while engaged in this business. Many persons think that the vessels while riding at anchor come together in a storm, and are foundered by such accidents; while others are of the opinion that the vessels are run down by large ships crossing their paths in the night time and in thick weather.

Journeyings in Winter.

A correspondent of one of our city papers gives an animated description of the mode in which the mail is conveyed from Canada and the United States to the settlers in the Lake Superior region. After mentioning the distances traveled by the mail carriers, he says:

Such are the frozen spaces over which a score of Indian half-breeds and their dogs carry and draw the letters and papers destined for our amusement and our information. A man carries from 50 to 75 pounds, and walks 30 to 50 miles. His two dogs go before him with a sledge or sled, with a flat board bottom, and draw 250 to 300 pounds.

This load, however, is not all letters and packages. All men must eat, and an Indian in particular. He must carry a half ax or hatchet, a plenty of blankets, and something for his dogs to eat, as well as himself. What can be more desolate than such a journey? Yet many persons from here make a trip every winter on business, in company with the mail.

Sometimes they have the trail of a previous party, but the snow, which falls almost every day, soon obliterates their footsteps. Perhaps there is a line of blazed trees which they follow, but more often they are guided through the forest by the 'make of the ground,' or by the sun, if it should occasionally peep out through the mists and snow of a winter sky.

Thus they go, from the first dawn of day to the twilight of evening, over lakes and mountains, through swamps and thickets, that in summer would be impassable, but now smoothed up level with snow.

The universal evergreen trees are bending to the ground, with a load of snow on their branches that frequently obstruct the way.

This dismal procession of Indians, white men, and dogs, go in single file, a few feet apart, and for hours they travel on at the height of their speed without a word or a laugh.

It is too much of a task to clear away the snow, start a fire, heat the water, thaw the bread, and prepare a forest meal, to stop for it at noon. But at evening, when the shades of a hyperborean night begin to gather among the branches of the trees, and the northern winds howl more earnestly, the company look about for a sheltered place in some ravine where there is water, and some dry wood for a fire, and there deposit their load of blankets and provisions. They scrape away the snow with their snow shoes, down to the ground, thus making a wall of frost around them three or four feet high.

Some cut wood for the night, others break off the boughs of the pine, balsam or cedar, and lay them down for a bed. Another procures some birch bark that is dry, and some dry sticks, and some one striking fire by his flint and steel, or his matches, has a cheerful flame, with its grateful heat enlivening the place. It is also necessary to build a lodge or house of boughs overhead, to keep off the falling snow, under which they all gather and cook their supper with great glee. If a camp of Indians has been passed during the day, there will be seen some fresh venison, that will occupy the best position around the fire, suspended upon the sharp points of limber sticks, set in the ground, and leaning toward the heat. There may be, however, only some salt pork, or ham and flour, made edible by means of a short-handled frying-pan and some water.

It would astonish city people to see the quantity of such materials that disappear on such an occasion. The meal, or rather the feast, is really intended for the whole of the next twenty-four hours. When it is finished, the party begin to unpack their feet and their blankets.

The blankets being well spread, the fire made for the night, the dogs fed, and the dishes washed, the crowd, animal and mortal, Indian and white, doubles itself together in most friendly contiguity, and goes to sleep. Long before daylight the inmates of this snow-bound lodging are in motion. The sounds that issue from it are English, French, and Indian, and all grades of a language composed of a mixture of them all. The moccasins are taken down from their drying-places, the hasty morning repast, which was cooked the night before, is swallowed, the packs made up, the dogs harnessed, and all made ready for a start at the first light of day. What piteous howlings these dogs set up as they are attached to the train! The human part of the cavalcade sling their packs, and all betake themselves again to the dreary labors of the day.

Prank of a Blind Horse.

An accident of a singular character happened on Wednesday night last, (says an English paper,) at a house in the Queen's Crescent. The house in question has a partly underground kitchen, with a skylight over it, and a bank of greensward runs sloping up one side to a level with the skylight. An old horse having been turned out for the night on the common, being blind, by some means got into the garden and on to the said slope. The tempting "bite" lured the unconscious grazer to his fate, for presently the unfortunate animal fell right through the skylight head foremost into the kitchen below, carrying the whole of the skylight with him upon the table, crushing everything to atoms. The servants, who were ironing at the time, had a most narrow escape of their lives, as the poor animal kicked about in all directions, bringing down plate racks, dresser, dish covers, &c. The poor girls, almost frantic, burst out of the kitchen and ran for their lives, fancying themselves in a place not fit to mention to "ears polite!" but screaming "fire!" "thieves!" "murder!" at the top of their lungs, while the rest of the inmates locked their doors and screamed for the police out of their windows. The consternation was great, and the crash and din so fearful that no one could muster sufficient pluck to venture on the scene of action. At length a policeman appeared and led the way, his light being turned full on, and so discovered the wretched animal amongst the heap of odd matters strewn all around, per force of his heels and body. The horse had sustained great injury, and was instantly killed.

Pumps.

The last Journal of the New York State Agricultural Society contains the report of the Judges upon the machinery presented at their Annual Fair, at Saratoga, in September. Among the articles mentioned is that of a Pump, which (says the New England Farmer) we have used on our premises, and can, therefore, speak of it with personal knowledge of its value. With two persons at the handle, it threw the water ninety feet, through twenty feet of hose, with a three-eighth nozzle. A child of six or seven years of age would keep a continuous stream running with ease. Water may be thrown over any ordinary buildings with it. Below is the description and award by the Judges:

"A. W. Gay & Co., of 118 Maiden-lane, New York, exhibit a cast iron pump called 'Warner's Patent Suction, Forcing, and Anti-Freezing Pump'—price $25, and of the iron pipe 32 cents per foot. The cylinder is 4 inches in diameter; length of stroke 6 inches. At the ordinary speed of hand pumping, it throws a stream through 18 feet of hose and a ⅜ nozzle, to the distance of 80 feet. When the point of delivery is 4 feet 4 inches above the surface of the water in the well, ten strokes of the lever raise three gallons of water; or it will raise, with ease, 27 gallons per minute, at the ordinary rate of leisurely pumping. In case of emergency, with rapid action, it could be made to raise double or treble that amount. It has a movable air-chamber, carries a steady, continuous stream, is durable, and unaffected by frost. Where a farmer desires to have a pump in his well, which, besides supplying his family and stock with water, will answer for a fire engine, when connected with a hose and pipe, he cannot have a pump better suited to his purpose than this one. We recommend that a Diploma and Silver Medal be awarded for it."

Compound Interest.

Some of the natives of Africa, although they may have little pretensions to a knowledge of mathematics in general, seem to have a very clear and comprehensive idea of the principles of compound interest. This appears from the facts stated in a report of a select committe at a British port, on the customs of a tribe in the vicinity. According to this report, if one native stole a fowl from another, the owner, if he had witnesses of the facts, would suffer the matter to rest for two or three years. He would then institute an action for damages, which are measured by this curious standard: It was in the first place calculated how many eggs these fowls would probably have laid in the course of one or two years—how many of these would have been hatched, how many of these chickens would themselves have become parents, for the period of time between the commission of the robbery and the conviction of the offender. For this imaginary wrong, damages have been given to the fullest extent, and husbands and wives, and whole families sold, to requite the owner of the fowls for his loss. [Boston Journal.

INTERESTING TO SCHOOL TEACHERS.—The Justice's Court at Worcester, Mass., has had a case before it which raised the question of the authority of school teachers over pupils during recess. The case was one in which the teacher punished an unruly boy for bad conduct out of school hours. The Boston Traveler says:—

"In an early stage of the hearing, the Court decided the question raised, whether the authority of the master extended beyond the regular school hours, in the negative, although the printed regulations of the Worcester schools require a supervision by the teachers as well during school hours as in recess, &c. Under this decision, the counsel for the master, Hon. Henry Chapin, stated that his client would make no defense, but submit to the judgment of the Court. Justice Green, after repeating the grounds of his decision, stated that it followed there had been a technical assault, and imposed the nominal fine of $1, without costs."

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

The time approaches when God's salvation shall have come, and when His righteousness shall have been so revealed that nations of the sons of the stranger shall joyfully submit themselves to His will, and when those who truly lay hold on His covenant shall be many. We are assured, that when the times of the Gentiles shall expire, and Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden down by them; when earth-born power, and tyranny, and misrule, represented by the several parts of the great image and the four destructive beasts foreseen by the prophet Daniel, shall have come to an end, "the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." (Dan. ii. 44.) For the prophet "saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him; His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." "And the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him." (Dan. vii. 14, 27.) "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, it shall yet come to pass, that there shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities; and the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of hosts; I will go also. Yea, many people and strong nations shall come to seek the Lord of Hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you; for we have heard that God is with you." (Zech. viii. 20, 23.)

This desire and resolution of the nations to come to Jerusalem to learn and to do the will of the Lord, in Millennial times, is repeatedly expressed in holy prophecy. "In the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the House of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come, and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the House of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths; for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And He shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Mic. iv. 1, 3.) That this points to the coming age, is obvious from the nature and extent of the promised blessings. It is therefore subsequent to the restoration of Israel to their own land; and we have seen from Ezekiel, that the Sabbath which Israel shall then observe is God's own Sabbath; so that when the law goes forth from Zion to the nations, it will include the Sabbath law celebrated in Zion. The same prediction, in nearly the same words, is given by Isaiah, but with still greater comprehensiveness; for while, in the prophecy already quoted, it is merely said that "people shall flow" unto the mountain of the House of the Lord, we learn from Isaiah that "all nations shall flow unto it." (Is. ii. 1, 4.) This same prophet, Isaiah in another prediction, pictures forth the glories of the Millennial reign, when the Lord shall have set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea." (Is. xi. 11.) In that day the Lord "shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of His loins, and faithfulness the girdle of His reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek; and His rest shall be glorious." (Ver. 4—10.)

Here, then, is the bright vision of Immanuel's Millennial reign—the Great Day of the Lord—the Sabbatism that remaineth for the people of God, and for a world weary of its own vanities—when Creation shall have at length been redeemed from the bondage of corruption under which it has so long groaned. The resting place of the Lord is glorious, the earth full of the knowledge of the Lord, the curse which sin brought repealed, and even the perverted instincts of animals, early made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him who subjected the same, are now restored to the condition in which they were created, when "God saw every thing that He had made, and behold it was very good." On that pristine goodness of the whole creation, the glory of the Edenic Sabbath's sun rose in its brightness, as it had first set in hallowed stillness; and when Paradise is now restored, and when to the root of Jesse, as to an ensign, shall the Gentiles seek, the original Sabbath shall not be unhallowed by them. None shall then be ignorant of the character and work of the Great Creator and Redeemer, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and none shall be unwilling to do Him honor. All shall then know and reverence Jesus as "the image of the invisible God," and acknowledge that "by Him were all things created that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him and for Him; and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist." (Col. i. 1—17.) Gentile nations, as well as the children of Israel, shall then have learned that "all things were made by Him; and without Him was not any thing made that was made." From this knowledge it could not but result, that the Sabbath memorial of His rest should be fully maintained. The observance of the Seventh Day, which on that account has been divinely sanctified and blessed, shall not be confined to Zion, or to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, or of Judah, or of the land of Israel.

THE MINISTER'S DINNER.

[In overhauling our pigeon-holes the other day, among papers which had been accumulating for years we found the following story, partly in manuscript, and partly in well-worn and evidently ancient print. Perhaps it has already appeared in the Recorder; but whether it has or has not, we are sure our readers will thank us for printing it now.]

The Rev. Mr. N. was a man of fine temperaments, generous feelings, and a highly refined and cultivated mind; but he was eccentric, even to the verge of oddity. He was a powerful preacher; and his doctrines being quickened and enforced by a life of spotless purity and active goodness, were thus vitalized; and his ministry was blest with abundant fruits. At the age of thirty-four, he surrendered his bachelorship to a beautiful, light-hearted girl of seventeen, a daughter of one of his richest parishioners, who accepted him, devoutly believing that to refuse the minister, would be a sin bordering, at least, on the unpardonable.

The marriage was consummated; the bride's fortune was paid over; and the husband, as husbands in the smiling light of the honey-moon are wont to do, surrendered himself to the humor of his young and beautiful wife, and accompanied her to several festive parties, which were giving by his wealthy neighbors in honor of his marriage.

The happy couple were sitting together in their parlor, one evening toward spring, the reverend gentleman studying the venerable Kempis, and his wife equally intent upon a plate of the latest fashions, when she suddenly looked up, and with an expression between hope and fear, thus addressed him:

"My dear husband, I have a request to make."

"Well, Nannie, any thing consistent."

"You do not imagine I would make an inconsistent request!" interrupted the youthful lady, with a fine expression of self-conceit curling her pouting lip—"only the least bit in the world."

"No, my love," he replied, for he had not yet entirely thrown off his gallantry; "but pray what is it?"

"Why, my dear Thomas," she returned, her voice trembling a very little, "we have been to several parties—and now"—she hesitated again—and then went on—"it is no more than right—it is no more than decent—indeed, we could hardly maintain our proper position in society, unless—unless—we have one."

The minister looked blank; but rallying himself, he said at length, "What kind of a party, my sweet Nan?"

"There, I am glad you have called me your sweet Nan; for I know now you cannot refuse;" and she put her bright face between him and his book; and brushing the hair from his forehead, she kissed him. That was a bad hit for the minister. He knew that if he did not capitulate, the fortress could not hold out much longer; and all he would have to do would be to surrender at discretion. As he drew her to his arms, he repeated his question—"What kind of a party, Nannie dear?"

"Why, like those we have attended. We will make the most delightful affair of it. An elegant dinner we will have, and after it music and dancing," she returned, smilingly, gaining confidence as her enthusiasm rose.

"Dancing in a minister's house!" ejaculated Mr. N."

"Why not, my love? What could be more charming?" she responded, in her most bewitching tones. "Of course you will not dance. The party shall be mine;" she added, tossing back her pretty head, so as to show its finest contour. "And you know we have been to similar parties all winter."

"True, true," he muttered, with an air of perplexity; and then he was silent for some time, as if considering the matter. "Yes, Nannie," he said at length, "you shall give a dinner party; and if the guests desire it, they shall dance."

"Thank you for a sweet love," she cried, throwing her arms round his neck, and nestling her head, with its bright flowing curls, in his bosom.

"But I have some stipulations to make," he rejoined. "You may give the party, as I said; but you must allow me to select and invite the guests, and also to place some of my own favorite dishes on the table."

"Certainly, my dear," she replied, "as in duty bound I accede to that. You know all our acquaintances as well as I do; and it is so kind, love, for you to save me the trouble of making out a list; for my poor little head will have enough to think of. But pray when shall it be?"

"Next Wednesday, dear, if you please."

"But our furniture and window draperies are very old-fashioned," she suggested, partially falling back into her first timidity.

"I should hardly think it necessary to refurnish our rooms, Nannie," he said, with a serious air. "All our furniture is excellent."

"It is, certainly, very decent; but people will call us parsimonious and ungenteel."

"O, if that is all," he answered gaily, "I will promise to spend a thousand dollars on the evening of the party—not in furniture, but in a manner that will be far more acceptable to our guests, and profitable to ourselves, and which shall exonerate us from all imputation of meanness; and you may expend in dress and viands for the table just what you please."

Thus the colloquy ended; he returned to his reading, and she fell into a renewed study of the fashion plate, in consideration of the most becoming style for her dress, which she determined to make as rich and brilliant as possible. The next day she went busily about her preparations, wondering, meanwhile, about the thousand dollars, and how her husband would expend so much money. But she had discovered something of the eccentricity of his character, and doubted not that he meant to give her an agreeable surprise; and her curiosity became so excited that she could hardly sleep during the interval.

At length the momentous day arrived. The arrangements were all completed; and Mrs. N. retired to perform the all-important business of arraying her fine person in fine attire. She lingered long at the toilet, relying on the fashionable unpunctuality of stylish people; and when the hour struck, she left her chamber, so light of heart, and joyous in the power of her own beauty, that she seemed to tread on air—or would have done, only that her satin slippers were the least bit in the world—no, not too small, by any means; but they were new—and certainly rather snug—or, as she would have it, just a good fit. Her husband met her in the hall. He could not help thinking of Judith, who went forth, gloriously arrayed, to conquer—as for a moment he was lost in the contemplation of her queen-like beauty.

"Our guests have all arrived," he said, at length recovering his presence of mind, as, offering his arm for her support, he threw open the door, and led her into the drawing room.

Did her eyes really comprehend the truth? or had she fallen asleep at her toilet, to conjure up that strange assembly in a dream? She put her hands to her eyes, as if to assure herself. But there they stood, in the strangest and querest groups—the maimed, the blind, the palsied, the cripple, and the old man tottering on the brink of Time. Here was a company of children from an almshouse, who regarded the fine lady with open mouths and wondering eyes; while others, with both hands in their hair, which no barber-artist had been called to dress, peeped from behind the furniture, or hid their heads in the window drapery, as if almost shocked by her dazzling presence. At first she was petrified with astonishment; and then a shade of displeasure crossed her fair countenance. But as her eyes ran over the grotesque assembly, her keen sense of the ridiculous overcame every other feeling, and she burst into a violent and uncontrollable fit of laughter.

"Nancy!" said Mr. N., rather sternly; and looking in his grave face, she suppressed her mirth, and said graciously, "Excuse me, my friends, and believe yourselves quite welcome."

"That is well done," whispered Mr. N., encouragingly. Then, turning to the company, he said, "As my wife is unacquainted with you, I will present you in due form."

Then leading her toward an emaciated creature, whose distorted limbs were unable to support his body, he said, "This gentleman, Nancy, is the Rev. Mr. Miles, who in his youth traveled far, and endured much, in the service of our common Master. A violent rheumatism, induced by severe colds contracted among the new settlements of the West, where he was employed in preaching the gospel to the poor, has reduced him to his present condition. This lady, his wife, has piously sustained him in his afflictions for many years, and by her own labor procured a maintenance for herself and him. But she is old and feeble now, as you see."

Then, turning to a group with silver locks and threadbare coats, he continued, "These are soldiers of the Revolution. They were all sons of rich men. They went out in their young strength to defend their oppressed country. They endured hardships, toils and sufferings, such as we hardly deem it possible for men to endure and live; they returned home at the close of the war, maimed in their limbs, and with broken constitutions, to find their patrimonies destroyed by fire or the chances of war, or their property otherwise filched and wrested from them. And these worthy men live in poverty and neglect in the land for the prosperity of which they sacrificed their all. These venerable ladies are wives of these patriots, and widows of others who have gone to their reward. They could tell tales that would thrill your heart and make it better. This is the celebrated and learned Dr. B——, who saved hundreds of lives during the spotted epidemic. But his great success roused the animosity of his medical brethren, who succeeded in ruining his practice, and when blindness came upon him, he was forgotten by those whom he had delivered from death. This lovely creature is his only child, and she is motherless. She leads him daily by the hand, and earns the food she sets before him. Yet her learning and accomplishments are wonderful, and she is the author of those exquisite poems which appear occasionally in the —— Magazine. These children were orphaned in infancy by the Asiatic cholera, and their sad hearts have seldom been cheered by a smile, or their palates regaled by delicious food. Now dry your eyes, love, and lead on to the dining room."

She obeyed, and notwithstanding her emotions, the thumping of coarse shoes, and rattling of sticks, crutches, and wooden legs, behind her, well nigh threw her into another indecorous laugh.

To divert her attention, she glanced over the table. There stood the dishes for which her husband had stipulated, in the shape of two monstrous, homely-looking meat pies, and two enormous platters of baked meats and vegetables, looking like mighty mountains among the delicate viands that she had prepared for the refined company she had expected. She took her place and prepared to do the table honors, but her husband, after a short thanksgiving to the bountiful God, addressed the company with, "Now, my brethren, help yourselves and one another, to whatever you deem preferable. I will wait upon the children."

A hearty and jovial meal was made, the minister setting the example; and as the hearts of the old soldiers were warmed with wine, they became garrulous, and each recounted some wonderful or thrilling adventure of the Revolutionary War; and the old ladies told their tales of privation and suffering, and interwove with them the histories of fathers, brothers, or lovers, who died for liberty.

Mrs. N. was sobbing convulsively when her husband came round, and touching her shoulder, whispered—

"My love, shall we have dancing?" That word, with its ludicrous associations, fairly threw her into hysterics, and she laughed and wept at once.

When she became quiescent, Mr. N. thus addressed the company:

"I fear, my friends, that you will think my wife a frivolous, inconsistent creature, and I must therefore apologize for her. We were married only last fall, and have attended several gay parties, which our rich neighbors gave in honor of our nuptials; and my wife thought it would be genteel to give a dinner in return. I consented on conditions, one of which was, that I should invite the guests. So long a professed minister of Him who was made so lowly in heart, I followed His word of command, 'But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind'—you all recollect the passage. Mrs. N., not knowing who her guests were, was highly delighted with the ruse I have provided; and I do not believe there has been so noble and honorable a company assembled this winter. My wife desired new furniture, lest we should be deemed parsimonious; I pledged myself to expend one thousand dollars in a manner more pleasing to our guests, and which should obviate any such imputation."

Then, addressing the children, he said:

"You will each be removed to-morrow to excellent places, and if you continue to be industrious, and perfectly honest in word and deed, you will become respectable members of society. To you, Dr. B——, under God, I owe my life. I did not know your locality, neither had I heard of your misfortunes, until a few days since. I can never repay the debt I owe you, but if you and your daughter will accept the next furnished house adjoining mine, I will see that you never want again. To you, patriot fathers, and these nursing mothers of our country, I present the one thousand dollars. It is just one hundred dollars to each soldier and soldier's widow. It is a mere trifle. No thanks, my friends. You, Mr. Niles, are my father in the Lord. Under your preaching I first became convinced of sin, and it was your voice that brought me the words of salvation. You will remain in my house. I have a room prepared for you, and a pious servant to attend you. It is time you were at peace, and your excellent lady relieved of her heavy burden." The crippled preacher fell prostrate on the carpet, and poured out such thanksgiving and prayer as found way to the heart of Mrs. N., who ultimately became a meek and pious woman, a fit help-mate for a devoted gospel minister.

SYRIAN MANNERS.

During our stay at Aleppo, Signor Fatallah, a wealthy neighbor, who was likewise proprietor of a silk manufactory, married his son to the daughter of an opulent fellow-townsman; preparations on a grand scale had long been going forward, and, amongst a vast concourse of friends and acquaintances invited to celebrate the nuptials, we also were included. The auspicious moment arrived and we proceeded to Fatallah's house, escorted by a band of native musicians. On arriving at the residence of the bridegroom, we were ushered into a long room in which guests were seated from the door to the upper part, according to their rank in life; the chief guests being seated at the head of the divan on either side of the master of the house, others were ranged lower and lower, the poorest guests were close to the doorway, and one or two so poor that they did not aspire to a place on the divan, but squatted themselves cross-legged on the ground. On the arrival of a fresh guest, the master of the house would rise and come forward to receive him; and if, as happened on some occasions, the guest, from mock humility, would seat himself in a position lower than what his actual rank of precedence entitled him to, an absurd scuffle would ensue, in which the master of the house would endeavor to drag the other higher up into the room, and the guest with many "Stafer Allahs," (God forbid,) and many false protestations, pretend reluctantly to yield to the distinction proffered him, and so gain honor in the sight of the assembled multitude. Such scenes brought vividly to my mind our Lord's parable about the meek being exalted; and rendered it clearly evident that this etiquette, so strictly adhered to by the natives of all Syria to this present hour, existed in the time of the Redeemer, and has been practiced from the Patriarchs downward. [Dr. Hamilton.

A LITTLE WITH GOD'S BLESSING GOES FAR.—It was a good saying of that poor woman, in the book of Martyrs, who being threatened to have but a little bread one day, and a little water on the next; replied, if you take away my meat, God, I hope, will take away my hunger; if God give but a little, he can make that little serve the turn, and then enough is as good as a feast. Well, then, is thy provision small? thy appetite shall be less. Is there but a little meal in the barrel, a little oil in the cruise? God will make it hold out. Is that little coarse, and none of the finest? Brown bread and the gospel, (said Mr. Greenham,) is good cheer, and indeed, brown bread, and the blessing of God, is a rich banquet. It is not the greatness and daintiness of the fare, nor the clothing in soft raiment, but God's good blessing that doth nourish and strengthen the body of men.

THIRTY-FIVE.

"The years of man are threescore and ten."

O, weary heart! thou'rt half way home;
We stand on life's meridian height;
As far from childhood's morning come,
As to the grave's forgetful night.
Give Youth and Hope a parting tear—
Look onward with a placid brow;
Hope promised but to bring us here,
And Reason takes the guidance now;
One backward look—the last—the last—
One silent tear, for youth is past.

Who goes with Hope and Passion back?
Who comes with me and Memory on?
O! lonely looks the downward track,
Joy's music hush'd, Hope's roses gone.
To Pleasure and her giddy troop
Farewell, without a sigh or tear;
But heart gives way, and spirits droop,
To think that Love may leave me here.
Have we no charm, when youth has flown?
Midway to death, left sad and lone.

But stay! as 't were a twilight star
That sends its thread across the wave,
I see a brightening light from far,
Steal down a path beyond the grave!
And now—bless God—its golden line
Comes o'er and lights my shadowy way,
And shows the dear hand clasped in mine;
But, list what those sweet voices say:
"The better land's in sight,
And, by its chastening light,
All love from lips midway is driven,
Save her whose clasped hand
Will bring thee on to Heaven!"

ROBBERS AMONG THE KOORDS.

The Journal of Missions for March narrates the following narrow escape of a Missionary of the American Board and his Nestorian attendants from a band of Koord robbers:—

The Koords seized the opportunity afforded by the withdrawl of the Turkish troops from their territory, to act out the savage ferocity of their natures. An adventure that befell Mr. Cochran, with a Nestorian Priest and two attendants, on a preaching excursion to the plain of Mergawer, in September, will be read with the deepest interest. The beginning of their labors seemed very auspicious. Three villages gladly received them; the last especially, which was wildly situated, was eager to hear the word of God. A large congregation which came together in the evening, gave a hearty assent to the truths which were spoken; and the Priest and others sat by Mr. Cochran's bedside till a late hour, talking of the worth of the soul and of the price of its redemption. The next day the scene changed. The Nestorians of the villages to which they came, had mostly gone to the Bishop's to attend a feast; the Koords were surly, and, to appearance, under the influence of intense bigotry; but as the only course for Mr. Cochran and his companions to pursue was to go forward, they put their trust in the Lord, and rode as rapidly as possible, till within an hour of the Bishop's, "when," the narrative proceeds, "on descending the bank of a stream by a steep and broken path, five armed men, with their eyelids blackened and their mouths muffled, suddenly sprung up from behind a thicket, and presented their guns to our heads. We immediately alighted from our horses, and made signs to them to take all we had. Two of the men commenced beating our Nestorian attendants with heavy walking sticks; and two came to rifle my pockets. One of them cocked his gun, and presented it to my head as a preliminary exercise. My cloak, and purse containing about six dollars, were given up, as also every thing in my pockets save my watch, which I secretly broke from the chain, and threw into the coarse weeds behind me. A few medicines, however, a note book, a pencil, and several small articles that were useless to the Koords, were returned. My watch chain and key still remained on my neck, awakening suspicions that I had a watch; and that was demanded with additional flourishes of weapons about my head. They also came to me several times, and demanded more money; but upon exposing my person to their search, they turned away, not taking any of my apparel, save my cloak. Neither were the pockets of the servants searched; nor was their apparel taken, save their loose garments. A couple of men were now placed over us and the horses; and the rest began with eagerness to rifle the loads, introducing the performances as before, by inflicting several blows on the Nestorian who had charged of them, and who alone of our number was so unfortunate as to have a dirk.

At this juncture, the robbers were heard to say that they must kill us all, to avoid exposure; an event which we considered at the time quite probable, as we knew it to be a part of their creed, that the killing of a Christian was a sure passport to paradise, and that the tribe were accustomed to kiss with reverence the hand of the murderer of a Nazarine. While the Koords were opening the loads, we had several minutes for silent prayer and for the commitment of ourselves to the hands of our merciful and ever present Saviour.

After some moments spent thus, I told my men to remain together, and in no event to allow themselves to be separated. I also advised them, in case of an attempt upon our lives, to endeavor to disarm the ruffians. Soon, however, we heard the Koords disputing among themselves respecting the disposition of us, some still advocating our murder, and others urging that we should be allowed to proceed on our way. In the mean time, as one of the men placed over us had two or three times made signs to me that he would give me my horse again, I resolved to put his sincerity to test, and asked permission to mount, which I supposed to be granted; but I had no sooner placed my foot in the stirrup than he drew his dagger, and struck it nearly against my breast. While the attention of the Koords was thus directed toward me, two of our party seized the opportunity to ascend the mountain side several feet, out of the reach of the robbers. I called to them to return, knowing that it would be impossible for them to escape, if pursued; but they replied, 'We shall be taken into the valley and killed, if we return.' My importunity proved unavailing, and they continued their flight up the mountain side.

This was very trying, as it seemed to me that any attempt to escape would greatly aggravate our condition, and lessen the chances of our final deliverance. But, to my surprise, they were allowed to continue their flight; and, after hesitating a few moments, I resolved gradually to withdraw from the spot, and in the end, if it should appear safe, to put the efficacy of the experiment to the test. I soon found myself a rod or more above them; when I turned, and scrambled up the steep acclivity, with all the speed I was capable of. My remaining attendant, the most athletic of all, immediately followed; whereupon two of the ruffians started after us, one of whom mounted my best horse; but he found it impossible to make headway up the steep ascent. The other advanced a short distance, without perceptibly gaining on us, whereupon he discharged his gun in our direction, and returned. Soon, from a high point on the mountain side, we were enabled to look down upon the men engaged in separating the plunder; while our horses, having descended to the banks of the stream below, were quietly feeding." The party, fearing if they returned to the road, they might again encounter the robbers, made their way along the mountain side as high up as the ruggedness of the summit would permit, often losing their foothold and slipping down some distance amid rolling stones and sliding earth, and sometimes brought to a stand by gorges whose almost perpendicular sides they must descend and ascend, till, about midnight, with bruised limbs and bleeding hands, and in extreme exhaustion, but with thankful hearts, they reached the house of the Bishop.

HOW DID YOU LIKE THE SERMON?

"I hoped you would not ask me that question."

"Why not?"

"Because, having so often given offense by answering it to others, I fear I shall be called one of the grumblers."

"Really, I was not aware that you were addicted to fault-finding. I supposed that you, like myself, were an admirer of our minister. You certainly give close attention to his sermons."

"That I do from principle, as well as preference and habit. To cover or avert my face, or in any way show marked dissatisfaction, while a servant of Christ is delivering his message, I regard as uncourteous and a proof of ill breeding. When I cannot look him in the face, and give him my eye and my respectful attention, I will withdraw from the congregation, and go where I can at least be civil."

"Then you admit that our pastor is a 'servant of Christ?'"

"Certainly I do, and in many respects I like him. He is a man of more than ordinary ability, and he is a close student. His sermons exhibit originality and vigor of thought, and they are well delivered."

"You might well say all that of his discourse this morning. Did he not lay it on well?"

"You have now touched the point that troubles me. Perhaps I am fastidious; but I confess I do not admire so much pugnaciousness. I know the Apostle Paul enjoined upon Timothy to 'fight the good fight of faith;' but it seems to me that we have an excess of fighting in our pulpit."

"Why, what could the man do? His text this morning—'Earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints'—was an injunction to give battle to error and errorists. I thought he did it with a two-edged sword."

"Yes, his weapons were sharp, and I should be glad to know that he inflicted no unnecessary wounds. But, apart from the question whether he is obliged so uniformly to select fighting texts, I would inquire if you observed particularly the cast of his leading idea? I believe that it was this, that 'fidelity to the truth requires a man to be contentious.' One object that he evidently had in view was a justification of his own practice."

"Doubtless he has heard of some complaints such as you are making."

"Very likely, for complaints on this ground are made, and there are enough in our parish to report to him all they hear. But I had not finished. The preacher seemed not to have observed that little preposition for—a very important word in my estimation. He treated the command in the text as if it were to contend against something, and not for the truth. Hence the drift of his discourse was essentially anti. And so it generally is. He seems to have before him antagonists which he is bound to meet and conquer. Now, I frankly say that I should like less of this. I wish him to be bold and independent, and I can bear a great deal of the positive style; but so much of the controversial cast of preaching is not to my taste, nor has it the effect to make my mind spiritual. I retire chafed and uncomfortable I do not hate error or sin the more, but am disaffected towards wrong-doers. I cannot easily maintain charitable feelings towards my fellow men, or pray fervently that they may be delivered from all evil. I once took a religious newspaper that was keenly caustic, and because I detected in myself a tendency to sympathize with its spirit, I gave it up, and subscribed for another, not so ably edited, but more Christian in its tone."

"I hope you do not think of giving up our minister, as you did the paper, for another."

"By no means. You asked me a question, and I have answered it. I get some good from his sermons, and can live, especially as I have the Bible, filled with all that is nutritious to the soul. I love the word of God, it is succulent, refreshing and invigorating."

SABBATH-BREAKING PARTNERSHIPS.

[Concluded.]

Perhaps we have said enough on this subject: at least, some of our readers may think so. But if such associations are sinful, duty to God and to our guilty brethren requires the oft-repeated reproof. "Precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little." Men do not stop sinning, usually, with one admonition; and where their worldly interest is concerned, one discourse goes but a little way toward making them see their errors.

In taking a stand against Sabbath-breaking partnerships, we are not conscious of being governed by any considerations of worldly policy. The glory of God and the purity of our Zion are the only motives, so far as we understand ourselves. Mistaken we may be in the views we entertain, but if we are, our mistake can be pointed out in a way that will readily commend itself to the understanding of the common people.

It may be useful, in this connection, to inquire what are the views of the pious of other persuasions in reference to such things. Would a conscientious observer of Sunday, one who honestly regards it as a day holy to the Lord, to be observed according to the scope and spirit of the Fourth Commandment—there are many such among First-day people—enter into a co-partnership, the condition of which should be the opening of the establishment for business on the first day of the week? Would he consent to have buying and selling and labor and noise in a place where any part of the responsibility would lie upon himself? We feel safe in saying that he would not. He feels that, wherever his responsibility in governing and managing is concerned, there must be a decent regard to the day of rest. His brethren in the church all feel it. The religious sentiment of the community in which he lives, demands it. Indeed, we believe there are churches that would bring a man to discipline, who should be guilty on this point.

Now we know that our First-day brethren greatly err in attaching any sacredness to the Sunday; nevertheless, the day is to them the same as the Sabbath is to us. They view it as sacred as we do the Sabbath. They even call it the Sabbath, and feel a solemn sense of responsibility with regard to the preservation of its sanctity. But there is no reason for supposing that the strictness with which they guard its sanctity originates in their erroneous doctrine that the day of the Sabbath is changed. There is nothing in this doctrine which is calculated to originate such strictness, but rather the contrary. It evidently originates in the Fourth Commandment itself—in the working of that commandment in their hearts, tying them up in a solemn sense of accountability to Him who said, "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy."

We allude to this prevailing sentiment among First-day people, because we think it ought [illegible] its counterpart among ourselves. And does it ever fail to find its counterpart among us, except in those instances where pecuniary interests are at stake? The Fourth Commandment working in the mind untrammeled by the popular false doctrine of a change of the Sabbath, ought to originate a strictness at least equal to that of our First-day brethren; and it is to our disgrace as Christians, and to the disgrace of the sentiments we hold, that we are in so many instances far behind them.

But our brethren say they are not responsible for the act of their partners in doing business on the Sabbath. In some instances, there are three, or more, of the firm, one only of them being a Sabbath-keeper, and the majority rules. Well, it is true, you are not required to govern the majority, nor to resist its decisions. But why did you place yourself in such a relation in the first place? By entering into partnership with two, three, or four persons, you all mutually came under obligation to serve one another. You became their servant, and they became yours; and you well understood that they were to serve you on the Sabbath, as well as on other days of the week. Your sin lay in making that bargain.

'But would not the principle insisted on lead to the repudiation of all business transactions with First-day people? If the Sabbath-keeper employs a First-day shoemaker, or tailor, to make him a pair of boots, or a coat, must he not, to be consistent, stipulate that the work shall not be done on the Sabbath?' Answer: The law of the Sabbath does not require you to interfere with another man's right to govern his own premises. Over them he has full and undisputed control. It is only within the premises over which you retain control, either in whole or in part, that your responsibility is directly concerned. If you give a man time enough to make your coat without trespassing on the Sabbath, and he, nevertheless, protracts the job beyond that time, and works upon it during the sacred hours, the responsibility is with him, not with you. The shop where he works is his own, not yours; the workmen are employed by him, and his right to regulate the manner in which work shall be done on his own premises, cannot be disputed, if we would uphold any kind of order in society. It is enough if you do not require him to work on the Sabbath. If you go to him on Sixth-day afternoon, and bespeak a coat to be finished the evening after Sabbath, well knowing that the job cannot be done without trespassing on sacred time, the case is altered. Then you do require him to serve you on the Sabbath-day, and become a party in the profanation. We think a conscientious man would not do so.

But as we do not design to say all that might be said on this important subject, we will here suspend our remarks for the present. In the mean time, we trust that our brethren who are involved in the practice complained of, as well as those who may be meditating any such thing, will pause, and consider whether they are making the glory of God the great aim of their lives. MISSION IN PALESTINE.

Now that our missionaries have sailed for the "land where the patriarchs rest," and are exposed to all the perils of a long and uncomfortable voyage across the ocean, and to an uncertain reception on their arrival upon the shores of the Turkish Empire, every item of information from Palestine will be received with interest. A number of letters have been received lately from friends there, which are quite promising of the success of our undertaking. Our friends there seem much encouraged in the work, and appear quite free from every apprehension of danger from the existing causes of disturbance there. American Christians seem to be favorably received by all classes, and are able to travel as usual, even in the interior of the country, without fear of molestation. Several of the Sabbath-keeping colony have recently visited Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Artas. At the latter place they desire to form a new settlement, having received the keys of the house built by them some time since, while in connection with Meshullam; and as the lease by which Mr. M. held the land of the valley is about expired, a new vigor seems to be inspired in the natives, who have made great demonstration of joy at the proposed return of the Americans. It is also thought quite important to reëstablish the school for Arab children which was formerly conducted with so much success. On the plains of Sharon much good may yet be done, as will be seen by the letter of Mrs. Minor to her son, which is deemed sufficiently interesting to publish in the Recorder. Great anxiety seems to be felt for the arrival of Messrs. Jones and Saunders, which was daily expected. They will find an agreeable accession to the number of Sabbath-keepers who will join to welcome them to the labors and toils of their benevolent work, there being now no less than fourteen seventh day Christians in that land, engaged in this missionary work. Mr. Dickson and family, who recently went from this country, are among the number. There will be, therefore, increased facilities for a successful introduction of the gospel to the neglected sons of Ishmael, to whom few have ever gone with the glad tidings of good news which has been so extensively proclaimed in other parts of the world. The unanimity of so many in the truth of the Holy Sabbath, will also do much to recommend the efficient assistance proposed for relieving the devout and suffering class of Israel, who are now assembled in the Holy Land, and need the mercy which through them we have received. It is hoped that the means may not be wanting to render efficient the expenditure of time and labor now consecrated to the practical demonstration of Christian doctrine which our brethren have undertaken in Palestine. Mrs. Minor's Letter.

PLAINS OF SHARON, Feb. 1st, 1854.

MY BELOVED SON,—I would steal an hour from busy care to let you know something of our present state. After the heavy rains in the first part of November, we had an interval of delightful weather, and had just finished sowing our winter seed, when, on the 22d of December, it commenced raining again, and continued two weeks. Since that time it has been very mild, with occasional showers, the thermometer generally standing about 66° at noon.

We have now two other very interesting young Jews in our family, about 20 years of age, who are active, dutiful, and anxious to learn. We give them lessons in English every night. They express great satisfaction in their situation, and delight in their garden work. Miss Williams' school, in the Rabbi's house in Jaffa, thus far, succeeds very well; and the little girls, at our last visit, had surprisingly improved. As sister E. Neill has learned to speak Arabic unusually quick and well, we have spared her to assist sister W., whose great experience as a teacher, and devotion to the work, we trust, will secure permanent good to the learners. We continue to receive expressions of confidence from the Jews in Jerusalem and Jaffa.

We received a letter from Jerusalem last month, stating that the Chief Rabbi, in consideration of some Jews wishing to engage with us in agriculture, had decided that it was allowable, under existing circumstances, for Jews to labor on the soil in this their seventh or sabbatic year! This has removed the temporary hindrance which we had anticipated for this year, with the most conscientious persons, as one such had left our work at the commencement of the seventh year for this expressed reason.

The President of the Jews in Jaffa sends his daughters to the school, and visits us frequently in the most friendly way. The door is, assuredly, OPEN to accomplish a great reform among the Jews in Palestine, if philanthropists at home would feel their degradation and need, and provide a way for their employment. If a few benevolent persons would unite and purchase a sufficient tract of this excellent land back of Jaffa for a Jewish colony, small or large, and keep the deed secured for such use, and others would add something for cheap shelters and necessary improvements, to provide the worthy and industrious with a cottage and a garden, how soon would these unemployed sufferers be permanently aided and elevated in the scale of existence? The Rabbis assure us, that if such employment could be secured, the Jews would immediately gather here from the surrounding countries. Why are American Christians so slow to enter and accomplish this great work for Israel, while they are ready to sympathize with, and bountifully assist and respond to other calls from the oppressed and destitute, as in the recent case of Hungary?

We have had several very affecting applications for the loan of small sums—in some cases where the borrower must go to prison, and where families were subjected to the greatest distress. The Arabs in our vicinity are very friendly to us, and many come a distance for medicine, and we are often surprised to see how easily they are cured by simple remedies. At such times they overwhelm us with benedictions, and bring little presents of fruits and flowers in return.

Since the war with Russia, the wild tribes in the interior have been very troublesome, pilfering from the gardens and villages wherever they find access. In such cases they frequently have skirmishes with the owners, and get wounded on both sides. We have never heard of their breaking into houses, or approaching where there are "Frank" fire-arms, and they never take life except in revenge for a murdered relative.

I have the pleasure of informing you, that on the 20th of December (1853) we were made glad by the arrival of Bro. Walter Dickson and family from Massachusetts, as emigrants to this land, with means to sustain themselves, and with the design of co-operating with us, in setting an example of industry to the Jews, and in employing and aiding them in agriculture, so far as means may be obtained for this purpose. We rejoice to find them eminently qualified for their arduous work. Bro. D. and son have already proved themselves to be ingenious practical mechanics and farmers in the work they have commenced. He immediately leased the other half of the same barrah (garden) with us and the house belonging to it. As the house is small, and out of repair, they remain with us until he can build an addition, and put it in order. By his care we received the force pump in good order, which was sent by our benevolent friend in Philadelphia.

On the 5th of January, Mr. S. W. Jones, agent for "the American Society for Ameliorating the Condition of the Jews," arrived, having spent two weeks previous in Beirout. He has come, I believe, on a mission of inquiry, in what manner agriculture may be most beneficially introduced among the Jews, and we were most happy in welcoming such a friend to Israel. The Chief Rabbi immediately called on these friends, and expressed great satisfaction at their coming, desiring them to remain near Jaffa, and promising his co-operation.

Mr. Jones kindly united at once with Mr. Dickson and son in the difficult task of putting the pump into our well, which, notwithstanding the great circumference of its unwalled sides, and its depth of 75 feet, they satisfactorily accomplished. The neighboring Arab farmers, several of the first citizens of Jaffa, and our consul, had been watching the experiment, and it was a moment of no small interest and anxiety, after several days of hazardous work in joining and bracing one slight timber after another, to secure the pipe and piston rod, and the staples for each, when the handle was at length applied, and the water came murmuring up the dizzy length, and ran out in a fine stream amid the cries of "fe moo-yah! fe moo-yah!" (there is water! there is water!) and "ti-ebe! kateer tiebe!" (good! very good!) from Abdallah and the laboring Jews. It is a fine pump and works well, but rather heavy from the weight of the water in so long a pipe, and we may be obliged to attach horse power to obtain sufficient water for our planting. It has many visitors, who wonder at American inventions and skill.

Our wheat looks very fine. It is over a foot high, has from six to eight sprouts from each grain, and of the richest green. Also all our winter vegetables are doing well. We send a basket of green peas, sweet potatoes, and beets, to our Consul at Beirout by to-day's steamer. Also, we have still a good supply of excellent oranges in our garden.

Bro. Dickson's eldest daughter has already an interesting class of Arab children—their poor parents being greatly pleased, and anxious that they may share in our sympathy. Some of their Sheiks say, "We are all donkeys compared with Americans," and express anxiety that our improvements may be introduced more among their people.

We have many calls from the sick and destitute, and much time and patient love is requisite to wisely divide the little we can spare to the most afflicted. We have had some very bad wounds to dress, and, although in some instances where we feared mortification must take place, on account of fractured bones, yet, thus far, every case has been recovered. Also, of the many who have received medicine, we know of but one that died, and he was a very aged Jew, who had suffered nearly a year with a slow fever in the city.

Our needles and scissors are often put in sudden requisition to piece an old garment, or make a new one for some desperate case, so that we have constant excitement and employment. Our greatest grief is, that our means are so nearly expended, that we know not how long we shall be able to continue our present labors. This we must humbly submit to that kind Providence, that through so many trials has thus far sustained us, and also to the dear benevolent friends at home, who have sympathized with our humble work. Our prospects of usefulness were never before so great, and the thought of finally disappointing the hopes of the suffering poor of Israel, who wait for the enlargement of this effort, is painful in the extreme.

I am happy to add, that the general health of our family continues very good, and we greatly prefer the healthfulness and temperature of this climate to that of the United States. The houses here have no chimnies, and having sold our stoves in our necessity last year in Jerusalem, we have needed a little fire morning and evening in our open rooms, especially in rainy weather; but thus far we have taken no colds without it.

But the steamer will soon leave, and I must close. Don't forget to remember us with grateful Christian affection to all the friends and donors of this cause, and particularly entreat the prayers of all the friends of Israel for its success, and that the hour of their restoration and redemption may soon come.

From your devoted mother, C. S. MINOR.

REVIVAL IN ADAMS CENTER.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

For some time past there has been a very encouraging state of religious feeling in and about Adams Center, Jefferson Co., N. Y.; and the Baptist churches in the vicinity have received considerable accessions.

There is also in the church known as the Independent Seventh-day Baptist Church, in that village, a very pleasant state of religious feeling generally prevalent. We have recently passed a number of days with those brethren, and think we have seldom if ever witnessed a more harmonious effort made for the promotion of the spiritual interests of such as attended the meetings, which continued each day and evening for nearly three weeks, after which they were only in the evening. At these religious gatherings, Christians of all the neighboring societies have manifested a union of heart and effort seldom seen in a religious revival. Baptists, Presbyterians, and Methodists, seemed to be of one heart and of one soul. In the seasons devoted to prayer and conference, all denominational distinctions seemed to be forgotten, and they appeared to recognize only the common brotherhood of the Christian faith. We learned that there were from forty to fifty persons, chiefly of the young, who came forward for prayer. We are not able to state definitely the number of hopeful conversions; but as far as we could judge, from twenty to thirty had, when we left, expressed a hope that they had passed from death unto life. Many of the members who had been in a lukewarm state of mind seemed to be revived, and confessed their heart-wanderings, and their resolutions to better adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour. W. B. THE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW.

When we placed on our fourth page an abstract of the Prohibitory Liquor Bill passed by both branches of the Legislature of New York, we hoped also to be able to announce that the Governor had signed it, and made it a law of the land. But we were disappointed; the Governor voted it. Nor is this all; when the bill came back to the Senate, and the question was presented, "Shall the bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor?" the vote stood, ayes 14, noes 13. So the bill is lost for the present, two thirds of the Senators present not voting in favor of it. The veto message of the Governor is a very long document, for which we have not room. The following abstract of it is from a letter to the N. Y. Tribune:—

The following are briefly some of the positions the Governor takes:—He thinks the provisions of the bill are calculated to injure the temperance cause, and be detrimental to the welfare of the commonwealth. He deems it unconstitutional and oppressive, and thinks that the people, when fully advised of its provisions, will view it with alarm. After quoting the section which authorizes searches, he quotes the eleventh section of the bill of rights, which declares the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures. He argues this point at much length, and concludes by saying that this clause deprives our citizens of the protection guaranteed by that section of the bill of rights. He declares the section of the bill directing the forfeiture and destruction of liquors unconstitutional. In regard to searching for and seizing liquors, malicious persons may take advantage of this law to get possession of property with fraudulent designs. By the section which directs the forfeiture and destruction of property, the door is opened to gross frauds and malicious proceedings. The two weeks notice would be insufficient to non-residents. It would not be, in the language of the constitution, "due process of law." He argues this point also at some length. He contends that this law reverses the order of every other known proceeding, as the person charged with an offense stands guilty until he proves his innocence. He points to other provisions, which he says are opposed to all well-settled principles of common law, dangerous to the liberties of our citizens, and repugnant to the religious and moral sentiments of this community. Our Constitution says, "No person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself;" but this act, if the facts should be of the character to criminate the party under examination, compels him to answer or be imprisoned. If he answers untruly, it is made perjury; if he admits the offense, he is arrested, and his premises searched. This unprecedented proceeding might be used for the worst of purposes, probably to obtain testimony in civil and criminal suits not growing out of this law, and in the ordinary transactions of life. Proceedings so tyrannical would tend to strife, bitterness, and resistance of the laws.

ENGLISH PURITAN SIRNAMES.—The following names are given in "Lower's English Sirnames" as specimens of the names of the old Puritans in England about the year 1658. The names are taken from a jury list in Sussex County. They would cause a smile in our day:—

"Faint-not Hewett, Accepted Trevor, God-Reward Smart, Redeemed Compton, Make-Peace Heaton, Stand-fast-on-high Stinger, Earth Adams, Called Lower, Meek Brewer, Be-courteous Cole, Repentance Avis, Search-the-Scriptures Moreton, Kill-sin Pimple, Return Spelman, Be-faithful Joiner, Fly debate Roberts, Fight-the-good-fight-of-faith White, More-fruit Fowler, Hope-for Bending, Graceful Harding, Weep-not Billing, Seek-wisdom Wood, Elected Mitchell, The-peace-of-God Knight."

In the last century, there resided in Rhode Island a man whose parents had bestowed upon him the brief name of "Through-much-Tribulation-we-enter-into-the-Kingdom-of-Heaven Clapp." For short, he was called "Tribby."

TOLERATION.—"All religions are tolerated here," says an English Baptist Missionary, writing from Ningpo, China, "if you will behave yourselves well, and not interfere with government affairs. The imperial family has adopted the maxim to leave every man to believe what he pleases, and to practice what he likes, if he will be a good subject. This toleration consolidates the emperor's power over the different nations which live under his sceptre."

☞ In the United States also, theoretically and constitutionally, all religions are tolerated. But it is a just occasion for regret and alarm, that in practice orthodoxy only is tolerated on some points. Take that of the Sabbath, for instance. In nearly every State of the Union, there are laws to enforce the observance of Sunday. The consequence is, that those who conscientiously keep the seventh day—the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment—are liable to fines and imprisonment for working on Sunday—a thing not only unscriptural, but unconstitutional and intolerant. In this respect, at least, our country might profitably take a lesson from China.

EVANGELICAL RELIGION IN TURKEY.—A correspondent of the London Christian Times states that in more than fifty towns and villages in the Turkish Empire, there are Protestant assemblies for Divine worship on every Sunday. The largest of these congregations is that at Aintab, about three days' journey north-east from Aleppo, where there are more than 700 Protestants, and the smallest may perhaps not number more than three or four souls. But yet, in all these different places, the Word of God has entered, and some souls are found who, we may hope, are spiritual worshipers. And besides these, who have openly avowed themselves as Protestants, risking all the consequences, there are known to be thousands among the Armenians, in the capital and throughout the interior of Turkey, who are really Protestant in sentiment, though not yet sufficiently moved by religious truth to impel them to take an open stand for the Gospel before the world. Twenty-five years ago, not a single Protestant could be found among all the natives of this land, and Protestantism was either wholly unknown, or, where known at all, it was considered as synonymous with infidelity and Atheism.

CONVERSION OF JEWS.—The following interesting intelligence relative to the Jews is gathered from the April number of the Journal of Missions:—

"Three individuals have been confirmed at Jerusalem by missionaries of the London Jews' Society, one of whom had been a papist. A German Jew, who confessed the Messiah with eyes filled with tears of joy, attributes his conversion to the influence of a Jew now settled in trade in Tarsus, a man full of zeal and love, and persuading all who come within his reach, to repent and believe. In Alexandria a Jew has been baptized, who was obliged to flee from Hungary, his native country, and became convinced of the truth through the labors of missionaries in Jerusalem. An inquirer of long standing has come to the knowledge of the truth in Constantinople. Two men, one forty-nine years of age, the other nineteen, have sealed the profession of their faith in Christ in Bucharest. Two baptisms have taken place in the vicinity of Dantzic. Much inquiry prevails among the Jews of Amsterdam, and a very interesting case of conversion has occurred."

INTERESTING DISCOVERY.—Evangelical Christendom says that a precious discovery for the history of the Reformed Churches of France has latety been made by M. Eugene Hagg of Paris in the public library of Geneva. It is the manuscript history of French Protestants in the various places whither they fled for refuge, a work composed about a century ago by Pastor Antoine Court. As is well known, Court was one of the men whose faith and zeal principally contributed to sustain Protestantism in France, during the reign of Louis XV., when its legal existence was interdicted, and the chiefs of the Reformed Churches were either banished or dead. Court published, in 1760, a History of the Camisards, but he had no time to bring to light his great work, L'Histoire du Refuge. In 1784, after the death of Court de Gobelin, son of Antoine Court, the unedited manuscript of this work was lost, and from that time no trace of it could be found. It is therefore a most unexpected circumstance, that it has at length been discovered among other papers deposited in the library of Geneva.

GREEK AND MAHOMEDAN CHURCHES.—The following parallel of the Greek and Mahomedan Churches, drawn by an Englishman, in placing the Mosque in a new and credible light, serves to teach us that charity for the Moslem which we have never yet known:—

"We doubt whether there is any British traveler or resident who is not conscious of the superiority, architectural, moral and spiritual, of the Mosque over the Greek Church—no obtrusive priesthood is there—no noise—no obvious superstition. The structure is beautiful; the courts spacious, cool, simple, and silent. There is the reservoir in the midst, for ablution; and within there may be some venerated copy of the Koran, some valuable lamps, and traces of decorations on the wall, but in the utmost possible remoteness from image worship; the houseless poor may sleep on matting of the Mosque, the aged may retire here for quiet, and even children may play in the marble courts. It is the home of the spirit, where every one may come to steep himself in spiritual influences, without hindrance, or intervention, and where a sweeter incense of charity is forever floating round than ever rose from the gold and silver censor of the Greek worship."

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.—Arrangements have been entered into between the Executive Board of the Central Association, and Eld. L. M. Cottrell, for missionary labor, to be performed principally within the bounds of the Churches of Preston, Otselic, 2d Verona, and Newport, to commence, if Providence permit, about the middle of April, or as soon as Bro. Cottrell can come. Preston will be the first church visited.

EPHRAIM MAXSON, Chairman.

NEW ANTI-SLAVERY PAPER.—William Goodell, a veteran and indefatigable anti-slavery writer, has issued a specimen number of a paper called The American Jubilee, which he proposes to publish monthly or semi-monthly, according to the encouragement afforded. The terms per annum, or for twelve numbers, are: Single copies 50 cents; five copies to one address $2; eight copies $3; thirty copies $10. Address Wm. Goodell, 48 Beekman-st., New York. The "new banner" which Mr. Goodell unfurls has on it the following inscriptions:—

No more compromises with slavery.

No more recognition of past compromises, whether imaginary or real.

No more constructions of the Constitution on the assumption of compromises.

No more delay in repealing all acts of the government that favor or recognize slavery.

No more rendition of fugitive slaves.

No more slave-hunting among freemen.

No more recognition of slave property.

No more voting for candidates acceptable to slave holders.

No more admissions that the Constitution, or that any adminstration under it, can, at the same time, tolerate slavery and protect freedom.

No more attempts to maintain American liberty without suppressing American slavery.

No more admissions that there can be slavery in the nation that is not national slavery.

No more pleas that the American government and the American people are not responsible for American slavery, and bound to suppress it.

A NEW PLATFORM.—We find in the National Era, an article signed with the initials of John G. Whittier, proposing the following as a basis for northern political action hereafter:—

"The present is the time for action. Let the movement begin at Washington at this very session. Let those who are willing to stand on the question of Slavery where the fathers of the Republic stood, unite, irrespective of party names, to form a League of Freedom—the nucleus of a mighty organization throughout the country, having for its watchwords:

"No slave Territory.

"No more slave States.

"The General Government relieved from all responsibility for Slavery.

"No interference by the General Government with Slavery in the slave States.

"No interference with the right of jury trial, the writ of habeas corpus, and other guarantees of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, in the free States.

"Slavery left to itself in the States which cherish it, without any extraneous aid or comfort, to reconcile itself as it best may to the progress of civilization and Christianity, and to the liberal spirit of the age."

THE JEWS OF NEW YORK.—Jews and Christians seem to be on good terms in New York, whatever may be said of their relation in other countries. A Jewish educational institute was recently opened in this city, on which occasion Dr. Raphall addressed a large congregation. In the evening of the same day, a dinner was had at the Chinese Buildings, at which 350 gentlemen were present, including some of the most distinguished Gentiles of the city, such as Judges Oakley and Campbell, Collector Redfield, Rev. Dr. Osgood, and others. Dr. Osgood made the leading speech of the evening.

THREATENED DUEL.—There was great excitement at Washington throughout last week, growing out of a difficulty between two members of Congress—Cutting of New York, and Breckenridge of Virginia—which threatened to end in a duel. Offensive expressions were used in debate by both parties, and we believe a challenge was given and accepted in consequence. But the intervention of friends, and the general manifestation of aversion to such a mode of settling difficulties, led to explanations, and finally to the withdrawal of the offensive expressions.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—A movement is on foot to relieve the Crystal Palace Association from the pecuniary embarrassments which now press upon it, and so open a way for the continuance of the Exhibition. The plan is to call upon hotel keepers, railroad and steamboat proprietors, and other men in New York whose business would be most favorably affected by the exhibition becoming permanent, to subscribe for tickets. Last week about $35,000 worth of tickets were disposed of in this way to four hotel keepers, three private individuals, and one railroad company.

ENCOURAGING.—A letter from Bro. Charles Card, of Troupsburg, Steuben Co., N. Y., says:—"I have reason to thank God and take courage. There are some seven or eight in Troupsburg and the adjoining town of Brookfield, Pa., who have embraced the true Sabbath, which has caused considerable inquiry. This change has taken place without any particular effort on the part of Sabbatarians. I can truly say, What has God wrought! If you have tracts for gratuitous distribution, please send me some."

THE GOSPEL BANNER is the name of a paper recently started by Baptists at St. Louis, Mo., mainly, we should think, to promote the "revision" movement. It is edited and printed in a creditable manner; but it would be more to our liking if it had less to say in denunciation of those who differ from it in regard to revision.

THE NEW YORK RECORDER, one of the organs of the Baptist denomination, made its appearance last week in an enlarged quarto form, and in a new and improved dress. The paper is edited by Rev. S. S. Cutting, in a manner deserving of praise and success.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 27.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Deficiency Bill. Most of the amendments of the Finance Committee were adopted. A short debate sprung up on the amendment making an appropriation for the purchase of a site of a new Custom-House at San Francisco, but without coming to a vote on the subject, its further consideration was postponed. The Indian Appropriation bill was then received from the House, and referred to the Finance Committee. A communication was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the expenses for transporting the mails, &c., to the Pacific during the last three years.

The House of Representatives took up the Indian Appropriation bill, which was finally passed. The bill establishing railroad and telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, was made the special order for the 3d Tuesday in May. The bill establishing four additional Land Offices in Minnesota was passed. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and took up the Civil and Diplomatic bill. Mr. Cutting, of New York, got the floor, and replied to the remarks of Mr. Breckenridge, of Kentucky. A long and exciting altercation took place between these two gentlemen, and when they concluded, the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 28.

In the Senate, Mr. Brodhead, from the Select Committee appointed last session to investigate the Mexican frauds, made a very voluminous report, which, after debate, was ordered to be printed. The consideration of the Deficiency bill was then resumed. The amendment making an additional appropriation for the Custom-House at San Francisco was withdrawn. Several amendments were offered and debated.

In the House, Mr. Stanton, of Kentucky, introduced a bill authorizing the recovery of the assets of bankrupts which have been concealed or not specified in the schedule returned by them, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee. An appropriation of $5,000 was made to defray the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws. The consideration of the Civil and Diplomatic bill was then resumed. Mr. Yates, of Illinois, having the floor, made a lengthy and able speech against the Nebraska bill. The amendment providing for the construction of six first-class steam frigates, was then taken up, and after a spirited debate on the subject, the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 29.

In the Senate, numerous memorials against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise were presented. The printing of 35,000 extra copies of the Agricultural part of the Patent Office Report was ordered. The Deficiency bill was then taken up. The question pending was on the amendment requiring invalid pensioners to renew every two years the evidence of the disability for which they were allowed pensions, and providing that no person holding any civil salaried office under the United States should be paid any pension. After considerable debate, the part declaring office-holders should not draw pensions was stricken out, and the amendment was adopted. After the transaction of some unimportant business the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the bill from the Senate for the relief of settlers and occupants of land at Council Bluffs, Iowa, was passed. The Committee on Public Lands made an adverse report to the bill granting lands to the several States for the support of indigent insane. The Committee on Naval Affairs reported a bill providing for apprentices in the United States Naval and Revenue service, and in the Commercial Marine, which was reported to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Barksdale of Mississippi, and Mr. Norton of Illinois, then addressed the Committee on the Nebraska question.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 30.

In the Senate, Mr. Badger, of North Carolina, presented a memorial signed by a large number of citizens of that State against the Nebraska bill. A memorial to grant a township of land to each college in the country was presented; also asking for the right of religious worship abroad; also, from the owners of steamboats on the Hudson River, asking that steamers not carrying passengers be exempt from the requirements of the law of 1850. The consideration of the Deficiency bill was then resumed. Several amendments were proposed and discussed.

In the House, after the transaction of some unimportant business, the consideration of the bill making an appropriation for the construction of six additional steam-frigates was resumed. Mr. Keitt, of South Carolina, addressed the Committee for one hour in favor of the speedy passage of the Nebraska bill. Mr. Benton, of Missouri, followed, and made a strong speech against any increase in the Navy.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 31.

The Senate met at the usual hour, and after some conversation, suspended the private calendar, and took up the Deficiency bill. The amendment appropriating $250,000 for a new site for a Custom-House at San Francisco, and $200,000 for rebuilding the Custom-House at Portland, Me., was agreed to. It was then moved to amend the amendment by appropriating for the completion of the Marine Hospitals at the following places: Cleveland, $25,000; St. Louis, $10,000; Chicago, $10,000; Paducah, $5,000; Louisville, $12,000; Evansville, $3,000; San Francisco, $44,000; and for a new Hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000. The amendment was agreed to. The amendment making appropriations for the completion of the Custom-Houses at St. Louis, Mobile, Cincinnati, Louisville, Bangor, Bath, Wilmington, Del., and Providence, was also passed. The bill was reported to the Senate, and all the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in, except the one which struck out the appropriation for the payment of invalid privateer pensions, and the bill then passed. After a short executive session, the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

In the House, the bill extending the contract for carrying the mails between Mobile and Montgomery, Ala., was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Mr. Preston, of Kentucky, then rose and stated that the recent difficulties between Mr. Cutting and Mr. Breckenridge had been amicably settled. The consideration of the bill for the construction of six first class steam frigates was resumed, and, after a brief discussion, the bill passed by a vote of 113 to 43. The House then adjourned to Second-day.

European News.

By the steamers Franklin and Canada, we have European advices to March 18th.

The report that the Russians had taken Kalafat turns out to be entirely unfounded. Indeed, they have not even attacked that place, but apparently have changed their plan of operations, and have withdrawn most of their forces further down the Danube.

The first division of the British fleet intended to operate in the Baltic, sailed from Portsmouth under Sir Charles Napier on the 11th March. The Queen visited the squadron in her yacht, and escorted the ships to sea. The remaining division was to sail in a few days, under Admiral Chads. The whole fleet, when united in the Baltic, will consist of 44 vessels, with 2,200 guns, 22,000 men, and 16,000 aggregate horse power of steam force.

The auxiliary French and English armies will not reach Turkey and be ready to act much before April.

Austria adheres to her declaration of neutrality, but while she approves the course of the Western Powers, states that her future course will be decided by regard for her own interests. Prussia also refuses to join the league against the Czar.

In England we hear of the sudden death by apoplexy of Sergeant Talfourd, the distinguished author and jurist, which took place on the 12th of March, while delivering a charge to the Grand Jury at Stafford. On entering the Court in the morning, he appeared in his usual health, and it was not known that he had complained of any symptoms of illness before taking his seat on the bench. He had taken a morning walk at six o'clock, and nothing unusual was observed in his manner, until some time after the commencement of his charge, when his head fell on one side, and it at once became evident that he had been attacked by apoplexy. He was carried out of Court by his friends, and removed to the Judge's lodgings, where he was attended by eminent medical men, but the moment he was placed upon the bed, he breathed his last, with scarce a groan.

Attempt to Catch a Fugitive.

Ten years ago a black man was sent to the Prison at Auburn, from Wayne County, for the crime of burglary. The term for which he was sentenced expired Sunday, March 25. It seems that the individual who kept the jail in Wayne County at the time of the negro's trial and conviction, having cause to suspect that the criminal was a fugitive from Slavery, took the trouble to look into the matter—and the result was, a fellow was discovered in one of the southern States who, having lost a slave, was willing to undertake the job of ascertaining whether the negro confined in Auburn was his property. Accordingly, he came on to this State, visited the man who formerly kept the jail in Wayne County, and the two together went to the State Prison, obtained the permission of its keepers to take a general survey of the premises, and to converse with at least one of the inmates; of course, the individual of whom they were in pursuit was found; they sounded him, and ascertained from his own lips that he was a slave; and that he belonged to the identical individual who had come all the way from the land of chivalry to visit him—to "visit him in prison." Next a warrant was sworn out, and the services of a United States Marshal called in requisition; but lo! it was ascertained that the warrant was a civil process, and could not be executed on Sunday. But the Wayne County ex-jailor recollected there were indictments pending against the criminal in Wayne County, upon which he had never been tried. Forthwith, he proceeded to that county and obtained from the District Attorney a bench warrant, but when he returned to Auburn he found he was not an officer of any kind, and consequently had no authority to serve the document he had been to so much trouble to procure. The District Attorney of Wayne County was again visited, and another warrant obtained; this was directed to the Sheriff of Cayuga County; but it seems there were doubts of its validity, and no attempt was made to serve it. The negro came out of prison on Sunday morning, was joined by a couple of his sable brethren, and walked off without molestation, leaving his pursuers to enjoy the consciousness that all their efforts had been without profit. Another Lottery Swindle.—A huge placard, printed in red and black ink, has been sent over the country, purporting to come from the "New York Mutual Gold-Pen Manufacturing Association;" which offers for one dollar a gold pen, and one chance in 150,000 for sundry prizes of lots, houses, ponies, pianos, furniture, watches, hats, penknives, and perfumed sachets, rated in all at $50,000. Look, now, at the trick. The whole scheme is conditioned upon the sale of 150,000 shares at one dollar each. Suppose the gold pens to cost fifty cents each—in fact, they cost the manufacturers about twenty-five cents—here will be $75,000; to which add the prizes at the estimate of the hand-bill, and the whole outlay is $125,000, leaving $25,000 clear profit to the managers. But, in reality, the prizes are not worth half so much; they consist of old stock, or of lots of trash bought cheap at wholesale. The net gain of the managers, if the scheme is successful, can not be less than $50,000. The whole number of prizes is 50,000. This gives to every buyer, besides his gold pen, one chance in three of a prize. Yes; but of these 50,000, 45,000 are perfumed sachets, rated at twenty cents each, and 4000 are penknives at twenty-five cents each. Deducting these 49,000, how many chances has the buyer for a piano, a gold watch, a span of Canadian ponies, or a house in Brooklyn or in Williamsburgh? Like the Perham gift enterprise, this is a great gambling scheme, concocted in the face of our laws against lotteries, and we call upon the authorities to put it down. [Independent.

Ocean Penny Postage—a good Omen.—A letter from Elihu Burritt to the N. Y. Tribune, says that the cardinal principle of the great postal reform, which has been agitated on both sides of the Atlantic for several years, has just been fully adopted and established by our Government, in a direction involving almost the longest ocean mail route on the globe. "An arrangement has just been concluded with a sailing packet company for conveying letters between New York and Australia for two cents per letter. Here is the principle established by actual and important precedent. Here is the first step to a universal ocean penny postage, a step that goes to the whole length of the uniform penny transit rate at once, and not by installments. Then it takes the longest distance to which it can be applied on the globe, as the first precedent and example. This is capital. Then it establishes another principle of vital importance to the full working of the proposed reform—that nothing more than the usual rate shall be charged for the United States inland service on letters transmitted across the sea in any direction. Thus the whole postage on a single pre-paid letter, from any distance within 3,000 miles in the United States, to Australia, is to be only five cents; or three for our inland service, and two for the ocean transit. This is all ever proposed in the project of an ocean penny postage, so far as applied to any one direction.

Fanaticism in the Turkish War.—One of the most serious aspects of the conflict between Russia and Turkey is, that the Russians, from the Emperor down, are said to be impelled by religious fanaticism. In recent reports from St. Petersburg, we read as follows:

"The Emperor is described by those who have an opportunity of observing his movements, as being in a state of religious exultation, regarding himself as the chosen instrument, under God, to drive the Moslem from Europe, and only regretting that he should have allowed so many years to pass by without fulfilling his destiny. The populace of St. Petersburg have worked themselves up to the highest pitch of fanaticism, cheering the Emperor whenever he appears in public, with the wildest enthusiasm, and denouncing as traitors all who dare speak of peace."

A Returned Collector.—Mr. Ely, Collector of the town of Stockbridge, Madison County, disappeared mysteriously, several months since, taking with him $1,800 of the public money. All sorts of conjectures were raised in regard to his disappearance. Many supposed he had been robbed and murdered, and a "clairvoyant" declared that his body had been buried under a heap of stones and thrown into a lime kiln. But nothing of the kind had happened; for, after having made the tour of Europe, he returned a few days since, and paid in $1,400 out of the $1,800 which he carried off. He says that, on closing his collections, he found $150 missing. This so excited him that he thought of committing suicide. But he did a wiser thing. He is excused on the plea of temporary insanity. [Albany Eve. Journal.

Emancipation.—Mr. Christy, an agent of the Colonization Society, who resides, we believe, in Ohio, has been offered a group of slaves, in one of the Southern States, valued at $15,000. The owner cannot emancipate them where he lives, and must remove them to some other State to effect his purpose. In view of the uncertainties attending the execution of wills, in reference to slave property, and the liability of his slaves being scattered after his death, he thus closes his appeal to Mr. Christy:—"I abhor the thought of their being sold after I die. My reason for wishing to emancipate now is, I don't wish the devil to get my soul, and the lawyers my money. Pity me, for Jesus' sake, and give me good counsel. Your brother in Christ." Mr. C. has accepted the offer.

Carson Leagues.—Mr. Carson is trying to organize a "League" in New York, with a view to the enforcement of the Liquor Law, if it is ever passed. If we understand the plan, it is to obtain notes from the friends of temperance, liable to be assessed in the ratio of fifty cents on a note of a thousand dollars, of sufficient size and number, in any given place, to defray the expense of prosecuting any violator of laws enacted for the suppression of intemperance. He wishes to secure notes enough to raise by assessment at least $25,000.

SUMMARY.

One day last week, twenty-five members of the Journeyman Tailors' Union in New York were arrested and held to bail, to answer a charge of conspiracy to injure certain other journeymen not members of the Union. The complaint sets forth, that a Committee, or certain members of the Union, demanded the discharge of these men from the shop in which they were employed, and, not satisfied with this, followed them from place to place with the intent and the effect of preventing them from obtaining work; that in consequence of being thus deprived of work, their families were on the verge of want; whereupon they went before the District Attorney and made complaint.

A dispatch dated Boston, Tuesday, March 28, 1854, says: The death of Jonathan Harrington, the last survivor of the battle of Lexington, who expired on Sunday, was announced in the House of Representatives today, and a committee appointed to honor his obsequies, which will take place on Thursday. The Governor has ordered out several military companies, and the Masonic brotherhood will also attend the funeral. The people of Lexington are making extensive preparations for the ceremony. Mr. Harrington was born in Lexington, and died there, at the age of 96 years.

A dispatch dated Ogdensburg, Wednesday, March 29, 1854, says: The dwelling-house of Mr. Cooper Tyler at North Lawrence was destroyed by fire at about 9 o'clock last night, together with all its contents. Seven small children, the oldest being only nine years of age, were burned to death in the house. Their parents had, after seeing the children safely in bed, gone to a neighbor's house to pass the evening. The fire broke out soon after they left their house, but they unfortunately returned too late to save any of the children or any portion of the furniture.

Mr. Joseph Otis, formerly of New York, who recently died at Norwich, Conn., among other bequests, left the following sums to institutions in New York: Union Theological Seminary, $5,000; American Board of Foreign Missions, $3,250; Home Missionary Society, $3,250; American Tract Society, $3,250; American Seamen's Society, $2,500; American Bible Society, $2,000; Female Assistance Society, $1,250. Total for New York, $20,500.

About 6 o'clock, on the night of March 31, an accident occurred on the Hudson River Railroad, causing the death of two men, and injuring two others. It appears that the 5 o'clock express train from Albany, when near Tivoli, came in contact with an immense rock, which had slidden from its place at the top of the embankment, and completely obstructed the track. The train was of the usual length, consisting of five passenger cars, none of which were injured; the locomotive, tender, mail and baggage cars, were badly broken, and almost destroyed.

The last anniversary of the birth-day of Washington was observed in Constantinople for the first time, with imposing ceremonies. In the harbor were several Turkish, English, French, Dutch and Austrian vessels of war; also, the U. S. ship Levant. In the morning each ship displayed the American ensign at the masthead. At noon the Levant fired a salute of twenty-one guns, which was immediately followed by a similar salute from all the other ships of war in port. In the afternoon Capt. Turner of the Levant, had a party on board his ship.

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Wednesday, March 29, 1854, says: Three boys—Edward Cullen of Liverpool, Thomas Veil of New York, and Thomas McCoy of Mount Carbon—were drowned yesterday in the Delaware, above Richmond. They were employed as team-drivers on the canal. They were in a yawl, in tow of the steamer Henlopen. The yawl was upset, and all were drowned before assistance could reach them.

The steamship Florida brought to this City on Tuesday, March 28, between thirty and forty bushels of green peas, and six champagne baskets of strawberries. They were raised at Savannah and Florida. The season is said to have been favorable for fruit at the South, and the next steamer from Savannah will doubtless bring large quantities of peas, strawberries, &c.

Dr. Hamel, of St. Petersburg, member of the Royal Academy, and Councillor of State in the Russian Empire, is now in this country. He comes, it is said, by order of Emperor Nicholas, to visit our literary, scientific, and philanthropic institutions. The letters which he brings set him forth as a gentleman of very high repute in the literary circles of the old world.

The House of Representatives of Pennsylvania has unanimously stricken from a bill before that body to modify the Public School System of that State, two sections allowing a portion of the public school fund to be divided among sectarian schools. The sections referred to were taken from the public school law of that State, which has been in operation for many years.

According to the Sentinel, published at Selma, Alabama, during a period of four months, from October last to February, that State lost by emigration on an average 500 persons a day, or a total of 75,000; and the property carried out of the State is estimated at $78,670,000. So much for the peculiar institution.

Ichabod Washburn, of Worcester, Mass., who has built a free church at his own expense, has also given $10,000 to the Worcester Mechanics' Association, to erect a Society building, on condition that another $10,000 should be raised. Immediately, $11,390 were subscribed, and the work is going on.

It is announced in the Boston Commonwealth, that the owners of real estate who have hitherto rented it to liquor dealers in Boston, are now requiring them to vacate, in order that they may rent to other parties entering into special agreements not to allow intoxicating liquors to be sold or drunk on the premises.

When a minority of the Illinois Legislature passed resolutions endorsing the Nebraska bill, Gov. Reynolds, Speaker of the House, voted for them. Since that time, however, he has become satisfied of his error, and at a meeting held at Belleville, Ill., recently, made public confession.

A portion of the town of Florence, Alabama, was visited by a fearful tornado on the morning of the 10th March, which blew down the Florence bridge, a magnificent structure crossing the Tennessee River, and built at a cost of $165,000. Nearly every house at the landing was destroyed.

John Wood, while in a state of intoxication, was burned to a crisp, in his own house, in the neighborhood of Mercer, Pa., on the night of March 20th. He went home drunk, drove his family from the house, after which it took fire and he was consumed.

Alfred Hovey, Esq., died at Syracuse, on the 24th of March, in the 76th year of his age. Mr. Hovey was one of the original Erie Canal contractors, and a man of indomitable energy. He assisted in making the canal through the Cayuga Marshes, in building the aqueduct at Rochester, and in blasting through the mountain ridge at Lockport.

The Crystal Palace Association are in legal difficulties, an injunction having been granted to compel the foreclosure of the affairs of the concern for the benefit of its creditors. The borrowing of money is alleged in the prayer of the petitioners for this process to have been without the authority of the charter.

The Government has presented to the owners of the ship Antarctic (which took off a portion of the passengers on the San Francisco) the sum of $25,000 as a token of gratitude for the services rendered. It was a voluntary gift, as the owners of the ship made no charge whatever.

Mr. John M. Daniel has resigned his post as diplomatic representative of the United States at Turin, owing to the commotion caused there by his notorious letter on "Counts stinking of garlic," and "diplomats with titles as empty as their heads."

A gentleman and two ladies—to one of whom he was engaged to be married—were journeying in a one-horse wagon near Watertown, Wis., a few nights since, when the horse walked off the road into a mill race, and the two ladies were drowned.

A dispatch dated Boston, Wednesday, March 29, 1854, says: The house of William Flanders, in Londonderry, N. H., was burned on Tuesday afternoon last, and his three young children perished in the flames.

A letter from Havana to the owners of the Black Warrior, states that the cargo was released, as well as the vessel, upon the payment of the $6,000 fine.

The steamer Black Warrior arrived at this port last week, after her protracted detention at Havana by the Spanish authorities.

A dispatch dated Chicago, Saturday, April 1, 1854, says: A boat containing three dead men was found on the Lake shore, eight miles west of Michigan City. They are supposed to have been fishermen from Milwaukee, and died from exposure.

David Richards has recovered $1500 damages of the town of Belchertown, for injuries sustained by Mrs. Richards in consequence of a defective highway.

Extensive and important discoveries have been made among the ruins at Nineveh. Among them is a palace surpassing in beauty all those previously brought to light.

The Hon. Ker Boyce, recently deceased, has bequeathed $30,000 to the College of Charleston, and $20,000 to the Charleston Orphan House.

The village of Poughkeepsie has at length become a city. The first charter election will be held on the 4th of April.

The Buffalo Republic learns that a few days since a house in the town of Northbush, in Erie County, was entirely destroyed by fire, and two children burned to death.

The Syracuse Journal of March 27th says: "Sleighing is tip top in our streets, and the snow is still coming."

In the year 1800, there were 413 Quaker meeting-houses in England. There are now but 317.

At Tahuta, Miss., some boys tied a pack of fire-crackers to a dog's tail, which ended in the burning of $200,000 worth of cotton.

The Toronto Examiner says 45,478 persons have passed over the Great Western Railway since Jan. 1, without accident to any person.

MARRIED.

In Genesee, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1854, by Eld. P. S. Crandall, Mr. Charles Thare to Miss Betsy Lackey, all of Genesee.

March 30th, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. Benjamin M. Vincent to Miss Sarah A. Ferrin, both of Almond.

DIED.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., March 27th, Henry Billings, Esq., in the 65th year of his age.

In Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., March 3d, of nervous debility, Alma Adella, daughter of Thomas and Helen M. Vars, aged two years, five months, and fourteen days. L. C. R.

In Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., March 20th, Burton Green, son of John and Tobitha Green, in the twenty-third year of his age. Brother Green was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, and from the time of his conversion to Christ until his death, embracing a period of about seven years, he manifested great steadfastness of faith. In this early and lamented death, the church militant has been deprived of one who was constant in his attendance upon the appointments for public religious worship, and ready in the performance of Christian duty. He was remarkable among all classes for an earnest and practical piety. For several years he was a teacher and superintendent in the Sabbath School. Among the many who shared his acquaintance, not one was ever known to become his enemy. His gentle demeanor won for him many and constant friends, beyond the pale of the church, who loved him in life, and mourning, followed him to his grave. But the virtues so apparent in health and active life were still more conspicuous in his sickness and death. The disease which finally wore out the suffering victim, was an affection of the spine about the vertebrae of the neck. His confinement extended more than ten months, characterized by almost constant and often excruciating pain. But during the whole time, no sigh, or groan, or word of murmur or complaint, escaped his lips; a holy fortitude and Christian patience shone conspicuously among his heavenly graces. In the immediate prospect of death, he said to his friends, "Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves." Let this be said as a memorial of him, "He taught us how to live; and, oh! too high the price of knowledge, taught us how to die." L. C. R.

At his residence in Oregon Territory, Jan. 10, 1854, of consumption, Mr. Thomas L. Coon, late of Wisconsin, in the 33d year of his age. Mr. Coon was a member of the Milton Church, with which he united while living in Wisconsin. In 1850 he crossed the Plains to California, but having poor health, he soon left that country for Oregon, where his health greatly improved, and for several months he appeared to enjoy good health; but the seeds of disease were latent, undoubtedly, during the flush of health; and in the summer of 1852, just previous to the arrival of his family from Wisconsin, he again relepsed in confirmed consumption. He bore his sickness with great composure, and Christian fortitude. During his residence in Oregon, his piety and integrity of character won the entire confidence of all who knew him, and the whole community, and especially those of his own denomination, feel that their loss is irreparable.

In Westerly, R. I., of pneumonia, March 24th, Daniel Saunders, aged 39 years. Bro. Saunders possessed those natural qualities of mind, to which were added those adornments of piety, which fitted him, even while young, for a valuable counsellor in the church, and a worthy member of society. He spent nearly twenty years in the communion of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, with which he connected himself at the time of his conversion. His distressing sickness was alleviated by those divine consolations which make Feel soft as downy pillows are." A. B. B.

In Alfred, N. Y., March 24th, Mrs. Betsy Nye, wife of Mr. Benjamin B. Nye, aged fifty-seven years, six months, and twenty-six days. Sister Nye had suffered for a long time from a pulmonary difficulty. For some weeks before her death, her sufferings were very great; which, however, she bore with patience and Christian resignation. She not only welcomed death as an end of her earthly sufferings, but as the gate to endless joys. At the time of her death she was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred. N. V. H.

In Genesee, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1854, widow Fanny Gibbs, in the 83d year of her age. She had a good hope of eternal life.

In Westerly, R. I., on the 9th of March, Harriet L., only daughter of Elijah and Fally Ann Champlin, aged 22 months.

Alfred Academy:

A First Class Male and Female Seminary.

ITS location, on the New York and Erie Railroad, two miles from the Alfred Depot, is romantic, retired, and healthy. The course of instruction is divided into ten departments, with an experienced Professor at the head of each. The edifice containing the chapel, recitation, society and library rooms, is one of the largest and finest school-structures in Western New York. The supervision of the students is parental, and well adapted to securing their highest intellectual and moral discipline.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order Chimes of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the Cherry Pectoral. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine Cherry Pectoral, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

From the Boston Recorder.

"Love not too Well."

O when I gaze upon his brow,
And look into his beaming eye,
Or, bending o'er, as I do now,
When sleep has laid his laughter by;
And listen for his breathing deep
To tell me that it is but sleep;
A something whispers to my soul,
With power beyond my weak control,
Love not too well!

O, never let the fault be mine,
The brightest form of earthly mould
My loving heart can e'er enfold,
To worship as a thing divine.
Yet who the magic line has found,
That deep—a mother's love—to sound?
Or who shall claim the power to know
When such affection's changeless flow
Loves but too well?

Is it the mother, to whose eye
No smile is passed unheeded by;
Whose ear can catch the faintest tone
Of that sweet voice so all her own;
Who loves, with trembling glance, to trace
The lights and shadows of that face,
Whose every pleasure, every pain,
Is mirrored in her own again?
Go ask that mother; can she say,
Though love holds such unbounded sway,
She loves too well?

Full oft the loving heart is found
Unable its own depths to sound;
Till it, like frailest earthly things,
Falls with the prop to which it clings,
And finds, alas! but all too late,
The secret of its bitter fate;
A voice, in that dark hour of woe,
Whispers the soul in breathings low,
Love not too well!

That thrilling voice—O, is it not
Oft heard from love's most sacred spot?—
Some [illegible] coffin's closing lid,
Where [illegible], too fair for earth lie hid;
Some [illegible] hillock, short and wide,
Where withered flowers lie side by side;
Some marble column's chiseled lines,
Where mourning cypress darkly twines,
Breathing in solemn, saddened tone,
O'er cherished forms forever gone—
Love not too well!

O, Thou, to whose unerring eye
Each human heart doth open lie,
Whose sympathizing love can cheer,
Whose smile dispels each rising fear,
Whose strength but makes our weakness known,
Leave us, O leave us not alone.
Show us Thyself—then shall we be
So drawn with love supreme to thee,
Those earthly forms, however dear,
Shall [illegible] no cause to bid us fear
They're loved too well!

Suppression of Intemperance.

The following are the provisions of the Act for the Suppression of Intemperance, passed by the Legislature of New York:—

1. That any person, either as principal or agent, who in any manner whatever, except as afterward provided, keeps intoxicating liquor to sell, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit all his liquor, and in addition be punished, for the first offense, by a fine of $25; for the second by a fine of $50; for the third and every subsequent offense by a fine of not less than $500, and by imprisonment for not less than thirty days. Every legalized seller of liquor who shall be convicted of selling illegally, shall be punished by a fine of $100, forfeit his liquor, and be forever disqualified from selling in the State. The defendant, if convicted, to pay, besides cost, fees and expenses, the complainant's counsel fee, as fixed by the court—not less than five nor more than ten dollars. In default of such payment he is to be imprisoned until paid, not exceeding a day for each dollar unpaid.

2. Every elector of good moral character who is not the keeper of a boarding house or any public house whatever, or a place of amusement or entertainment or pedlar, may sell intoxicating liquors and alcohol for mechanical, chemical, or medicinal purposes, and wine for sacramental use; provided he shall, within one year previous, have filed in the office of the Clerk of the County in which such liquor is to be sold, on undertaking executed by himself and two good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the County Judge of the said County, or in the City of New York, by one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, and acknowledged before said Judge, that he will not violate any provision of this act, and will pay all fines, damages and costs which may be imposed upon or recovered against him in any action, civil or criminal, to be commenced under any of the provisions of this act; and provided further, that he shall also have filed with his undertaking or declaration, on oath or affirmation, taken before said Judge, setting forth the town or ward, and particularly designating and describing the premises and place in which he intends to sell such liquor, and declaring that he is an elector of such town or ward, and does not use intoxicating liquor as a beverage, and is not, and during the time he shall sell such liquor, will not be a pedlar, nor the keeper of nor interested in any inn, tavern, [illegible] house, victualing house, grocery or fruit store, bar-room, confectionery, or other place of public entertainment, nor the keeper of nor interested in any theater, museum, or other place of public amusement, or the captain, commander, agent, clerk or servant of, or on any vessel, boat, or water craft of any kind whatever, and will not violate any of the provisions of this act; and provided further, that he shall, within one year previous, have filed a copy of such undertaking and declaration, certified by the county clerk, in the office of the clerk of the town or city in which such liquor is to be sold. No such undertaking shall be approved by any such Judge, unless the applicant shall be a person of good moral character, and such sureties shall be householders within such county, and shall severally justify in the sum of five hundred dollars each, over and above all debts, demands, liabilities, or legal exemptions, and shall also make oath or affirmation that they have not become possessed of any property for the purpose of enabling them to justify as such sureties, and that they are not and will not become directly or indirectly engaged or interested in the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor during the continuance of their suretyship.

3. Those allowed to sell by the preceding section, may sell for the purposes specified, in the following cases only (but not to be used on the premises:) To inhabitants of the place, of the age of 21, of good character for sobriety, and believing that it is not to be used as a beverage, or to be given away; or to persons allowed to sell.

4. Courts of Special Sessions shall have power to hear and determine charges of offenses against any of the provisions, except the 35th and 36th sections, and to punish as provided in first section. This section also points out the manner of proceeding.

5. It is made the duty of Supervisors, Superintendents and Overseers of the Poor, and the right of every person, to prosecute a complaint against offenders. In case persons other than the officers named shall fail to make out a prima facia case, the Court shall render judgment against such persons for costs and issue execution thereon in the same manner as in civil actions before Justices of the Peace.

6. One or more such offenses may be charged against the same person, and they shall be tried at the same time, and each offense shall be punished as upon separate convictions, but they shall be considered as all of the same degree.

7. A certificate under the hand of any magistrate stating the offense charged and the conviction and judgment thereon, shall be evidence in any court of the facts therein stated; but shall not be read as evidence in any other county, unless containing a certificate of City and County Clerk that such magistrate was duly qualified at the time of conviction.

8. Every warrant issued for the arrest of persons charged with an offense (except against those allowed to sell) shall be on the oath of two or more credible persons, and though the officer shall not find the person charged, he shall search for, seize and store the liquor.

9. Whenever, on the oath or affirmation of two or more credible persons, a complaint shall be made to a magistrate that there is reason to believe intoxicating liquor is kept for sale in any place whatever, a warrant must be issued to search the premises, if in them there is a store, if not, before the warrant can issue there must be proof that within a month liquor has been sold there.

10. It shall be the duty of a sheriff, under-sheriff, constable, or other officer, to arrest any person whom they shall see actually engaged in an offense, and seize upon all liquors exposed for sale, together with the vessels containing them.

11. These officers shall also search every suspected place, and on finding liquor illegally kept, seize and prosecute the keeper.

12. Notice shall be given the owner of the seizure of the liquor.

13. Liquors seized, if not reclaimed and innocence proved, after two weeks' notice, shall be forfeited.

14. The claimant of the liquor seized may have his claim tried by a Jury if he prefers it.

15. The claimant may, within ten days, make an appeal to the County Judge.

16. The decision of the County Judge shall be final.

17. Forfeited liquor shall, when forty-five days shall have elapsed after judgment has been affirmed, be destroyed.

18. No proceeding under the act to be rendered void by reason of technical errors.

19. On complaint and oath of suspicion that a third person is cognizant of any violation of the act, the third person may be summoned to appear as a witness. If the witness refuse to appear he subjects himself to a fine of $10, and in default of payment to imprisonment as provided in the first section.

20. It shall be the duty of every policeman, when he shall see a man intoxicated in any street or public place, to take him in custody, and when sober take him forthwith before a magistrate.

21. When a person shall appear or be brought before a magistrate, under the two preceding sections, he shall be put under oath and examined to ascertain whether any offense has been committed against the provisions of this act. If he refuse to answer, he shall be committed until he consents. If it be found an offense has been committed, a warrant shall be issued to bring up the offender.

22. Fines shall be paid to the overseer of the poor of the town for the support of the poor; when such expense is paid by county, to the county treasurer.

23. Malicious complaints to be punished by paying costs and a counsel fee to defendant of not less than five nor more than ten dollars.

24. No person convicted under this act to be a competent juror, and if a juror, on examination, is shown to be engaged in the illegal sale of liquor, he is thereby disqualified.

25. No action to be maintained to recover value of liquor sold, taken or detained, unless shown that such liquor was sold not according to this act, or was kept for lawful purposes.

26. A married woman can recover the money paid by a husband or child (and vice versa) for liquor illegally sold.

27. All securities and evidences for debt given in whole or in part for liquor illegally sold to be void.

28. Any person selling illegally to be held liable for all damages accruing therefrom.

29. Any person may maintain an action against any other person who shall sell liquor contrary to this law to the husband, wife, parent, child, guardian, ward, apprentice or servant of the plaintiff, and it shall not be necessary to prove any special damage. All damages awarded a minor shall be the property of such minor, and be applied to his support and education. A married woman may maintain such action in her own name, with or without the consent of her husband.

30. Specifies the manner of proceeding in civil actions.

31. Makes sureties liable to the recovery of judgments.

32. Upon trial of any complaint or civil action, proof of sale of liquor shall be sufficient to sustain an averment of unlawful sale. It shall not be necessary to prove a payment.

33. Forbids any person or Corporation, under a penalty of $50, carrying liquor through or in the State, unless under five gallons, and no person or Corporation shall deliver any liquor to any other person or Corporation, unless marked "intoxicating liquor."

34. Persons convicted may be sentenced to a penitentiary at hard labor, instead of to the common jail.

35. Any public officer neglecting or refusing duty to be fined not over $500, or imprisoned not over one year, or both fined and imprisoned, and by forfeiture of office, except those of judicial officers.

36. Every person who shall wilfully and corruptly swear under the provisions of this act, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of perjury.

37. Existing laws relative to misdemeanors shall apply to offenses under this act, except when inconsistent.

38. Provides the following fees:

To any magistrate performing the following services:

For every warrant or summons of any kind, twenty-five cents.

For the trial of any claim, one dollar.

For a certificate of conviction, 25 cents.

For taking and certifying complaint to another magistrate, fifty cents.

To any sheriff, or other officer performing the following services:

For serving an order of County Judge, or summons for witnesses, for each person served, twenty-five cents.

For executing any warrant of search, or making any search without process, one dollar.

For conveying liquor seized to place of storage, fifty cents, besides expenses of labor, cartage and storage.

For executing warrant for destruction of forfeited liquor, besides actual expenses, one dollar.

For conveying certified complaint to any magistrate, or notice of appeal, undertaking and minutes to County Judge, fifty cents.

For every mile traveled more than one in performing any of the above services, six cents.

To the person other than the complainant smmoned to witness the destruction of forfeited liquor, for witnessing such destruction, and joining with the officer in making proof thereof, one dollar.

To any supervisor or superintendent of the poor, or overseer of the poor, two dollars for each day in which he is actually engaged in attending to any complaint or prosecution.

Upon judgment of affirmance, upon any appeal by any claimant of liquors seized under this act, the cost of the complainant shall be the same as upon appeals from jugments in civil actions rendered by justices of the peace.

39. Provides that cider may be sold in quantities of not less than twenty-eight gallons, but not to be drank on the premises. Offenses against this section punished same as those in first section.

40. It shall be the duty of the presiding Judge of every Court of Oyer and Terminer, and of every Court of Sessions specially to charge every Grand Jury to inquire into all violation of or offenses under this act.

41. No licenses to sell intoxicating liquor shall hereafter be granted to extend beyond the time when this act shall take effect.

42. All acts and parts of acts, inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed. But no suit or indictment had before this act takes effect, shall in any manner be effected thereby.

43. This act shall take effect on the first day of December next, except section forty-one, which shall take effect immediately.

A Bit of Romance.

Under the hymenial head in one of our exchanges we find the following:—

Married, in the village of Conneaut, Ohio, Feb. 11, by J. Q. Farmer, Esq., Mr. Elias Jones to Mrs Delia Swap. There is a little history connected with the above, says the Conneaut Reporter, which may not be uninteresting to the reader. About the close of the last war with Great Britain the parties became acquainted with each other, and in April, 1822, were married in the County of Genesee, N. Y., against the consent and wishes of relatives on both sides. A few weeks prior to the birth of their second son, Bradford, now of this place, Mr. J. left his family for the purpose of purchasing a piece of land, and during his absence his wife was persuaded by her relatives to desert her home and husband and reside with them. Mr. J., on learning the fact, and being threatened with violence if he attempted to claim his family, left the country and went to sea. On his return, several years subsequent, he ascertained that Mrs J. had again married, and removed to the West. In palliation of this transaction, it should be stated that the wife supposed her former husband dead, and did receive tidings of his supposed loss at sea. Mr. Jones immediately returned to his vocation on the sea, and from that period until a few weeks since, lost all trace of his wife and his two sons. After a space of twenty-five years he chanced, by a mere circumstance, to learn the residence of his two sons, and wended his steps to this place, where, to his gratification, he learned that their mother was still living and a widow, having lost her second husband after rearing ten children, and then residing in Mercer, Pa. In company with his son Mr. Jones immediately started for the residence of the partner of his youth, who at once recognized and welcomed him to her home; though she could not have been more surprised had he risen from the grave to confront her. The trials of the past were recounted, the love of youth renewed, and after a brief courtship they were again plighted, and the finale is recorded at the head of this article.

Lamartine's Mother.

It was the fate of the father of Lamartine, the great living French poet and orator, to be mixed up with the first French revolution. During that stormy period he, with a great number of his compatriots, were immurred in prison at Maçon. He was not there long before his wife, with her child, took lodgings opposite the window of the cell which enclosed the republican. She soon drew his attention to herself and his child, which, though he could not speak to her for fear of the sentinel, reconciled him in some measure to his captivity, and lessened the burden of his woes. "My mother," says Lamartine, "carried me every day in her arms to the garret window, showed me to my father, gave me nourishment before him, made me stretch out my little hands towards the bars of his prison, then, pressing my forehead to her breast, she almost devoured me with kisses in the sight of the prisoner, and seemed thus to waft him mentally all the caresses which she lavished on me."

At last she hit on the happy expedient of conveying him letters in the following manner: She procured a bow and some arrows, and tying a letter to a thread, she shot the arrow, to which was attached the other end of the thread, into the window of the prisoner's cell. In this way she sent him pens, ink, and paper. He then, by the same ingenious expedient, sent love-letters to her. Thus the separated husband and wife were enabled to correspond, to cheer each other's hopes, and sustain each other in their misfortunes. This was all done at night-time, when the scrutinizing eyes of the sentinels remained in happy ignorance of the medium of communication. Success having inspired courage, the lady, with the assistance of the arrow and thread, afterwards conveyed a file to the captive, with which he filed silently through one of the bars of his prison, and then restored it to its place. On the next evening, when there was no moonlight, a stout cord was fastened to the thread, and transmitted to the prisoner. The rope was firmly fastened on the one end to a beam in the garret of the lady, and the other end to the bars of the cell; then, summoning up all his courage, the prisoner glided along the rope, above the heads of the sentinels; he crossed the street, and found himself in the arms of his wife and beside the cradle of his child. Such an adventure required the hero's courage, and the philosopher's caution, and none but those who were personally interested in it can ever imagine the feelings which must have agitated their hearts! From time to time, when the night was dark, the knotted cord would glide from window to window, and the prisoner would pass from knot to knot, and enjoy delightful hours of converse with her whom he loved best on earth.

Brain and Thought.

Richmond mentions the case of a woman whose brain was exposed in consequence of the removal of a considerable portion of its bony covering by disease. He says he repeatedly made pressure on the brain, and each time suspended all feeling and all intellect, which were instantly restored when the pressure was withdrawn. The same writer also relates another case, that of a man who had been trepanned, and who perceived his intellectual faculties failing, and his existence drawing to a close, every time the effused blood collected upon the brain so as to produce pressure. Professor Chapman, of Philadelphia, mentions in his lectures that he saw an individual with his skull perforated and the brain exposed, who was accustomed to submit himself to the same experiment of pressure as the above, and who was exhibited by the late Professor Westar to his class. His intellect and moral faculties disappeared on the application of pressure to the brain; they were held under the thumb, as it were, and restored at pleasure to their full activity by discontinuing the pressure. But the most extraordinary case of this kind within my knowledge, and one peculiarly interesting to the physiologist and metaphysician, is related by Sir Astley Cooper in his surgical lectures. A man, by the name of Jones, received an injury of his head while on board a vessel in the Mediterranean, which rendered him insensible. The vessel, soon after this, made Gibraltar, where Jones was placed in the hospital, and remained several months in the same insensible state. He was then carried on board the Dolphin frigate to Deptford, and from thence was sent to St. Thomas' Hospital, London. He lay constantly on his back, and breathed with difficulty. His pulse was regular, and each time it beat he moved his fingers. When hungry or thirsty, he moved his lips and tongue. Mr. Clyne, the surgeon, found a portion of the skull depressed, trepanned him, and removed the depressed portion. Immediately after this operation the motion of the fingers ceased, and at four o'clock in the afternoon (the operation having been performed at one) he sat up in bed; sensation and volition returned, and in four days he got out of bed and conversed. The last thing he remembered was the circumstances of taking a prize in the Mediterranean. From the moment of the accident, thirteen months and a few days, oblivion had come over him, and all recollection ceased. He had, for more than one year, drunk of the cup of Lethe, and lived wholly unconscious of existence; yet, on removing a small portion of bone which pressed upon the brain, he was restored to the full possession of the powers of his mind and body. Guano.

The best way to apply guano to any crop, is to sow it broad-cast, after breaking all the lumps, without any mixture, and plow it in, at the rate of 200 to 500 lbs. per acre. Each 100 lbs. will cost about $3 on the land, and add five to ten bushels of grain to the product. If you cannot plow in it, mix it well with the soil by harrowing. If you plow a deep furrow for your row of corn and sow the guano in the bottom and cover it five or six inches by another furrow, it will do well. Take care that you never let it come in contact with seed or plant.

When corn is growing, you may plow in guano by the side of the rows. You may sow it upon growing wheat, and harrow it in to good advantage. You may sow it upon grass, and gain two dollars worth of hay for every one spent. Both on wheat and grass, and in all cases when used as a top dressing, mix half a bushel of plaster with each cwt., or make a compost with swamp marsh, charcoal, fine clay or loam. Use 200 pounds of Peruvian Guano to the acre, and you will find it equivalent to a fair dressing of stable manure.

Never mix lime or ashes with guano—never wet it before using—keep it dry, and it never loses strength. It produces the best effect upon poor sandy land, but is good for any dry soil in need of manuring.

It is very valuable for garden vegetables, giving them great size and good flavor and producing no weeds. It is excellent for any lady's flower garden, but she must use it as sparingly as our old aunt used to be of her tea, when she made it for hired men, and us boys; and if they are careful never to make it any stronger it will not kill their plants. A pinch the size of the same good old lady's pinch of Scotch snuff, dissolved in a tumbler of water and used on a potted plant, will make it start into life like a May shower. Guano is sold in bags of 130 to 150 lbs. each. [Tribune.

Introduction of Domestic Animals into America.

The following account of the introduction of domestic animals into this country, has been condensed from the census report. It furnishes a key to the origin of our native cattle:

The first animals brought to America from Europe, were imported by Columbus in his second voyage, in 1493. He left Spain as admiral of seventeen ships, bringing a collection of European trees, plants, and seeds of various kinds, a number of horses, a bull, and several cows.

The first horses brought into any part of the territory at present embraced in the United States, were landed in Florida by Cabeca de Vaca, in 1527, forty-two in number, all of which perished or were otherwise killed. The next importation was also brought to Florida, by De Soto, in 1639, which consisted of horses and swine, among which were thirteen sows; the progeny of the latter soon increasing to several hundred.

The Portuguese took cattle and swine to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia in the year 1553. Thirty years after, they had multiplied so abundantly, that Sir Richard Gilbert attempted to land there to obtain supplies of cattle and hogs for his crew, but was wrecked.

Swine and other domestic animals were brought over to Acadia by M. L'Escarhot, a French lawyer, in 1604, the year that country was settled. In 1608, the French extended their settlement into Canada, and soon introduced various animals.

Domestic Recipes.

To Clean Paint.—Smear a piece of flannel in common whiting, mixed to the consistency of common paste, in warm water. Rub the surface to be cleaned quite briskly, and wash off with pure cold water. Grease spots will in this way be almost instantly removed, as well as other filth, and the paint will retain its brilliancy and beauty unimpaired.

To make Bread without Yeast.—Dissolve a table spoonful of saleratus in half a tea cup of warm water, (pound it well first) rub it well through 3 lbs. flour, then mix it well with butter-milk, till quite soft, place in pans, let it bake, rather slow, about an hour and a half—a small slice of butter improves it.

VARIETY.

The daily newspapers in London are furnished at prices from twenty to twenty-six shillings a quarter, the Chronicle and Daily News being the lowest. We notice that parties in London advertise to mail the daily papers the same day of their publication for $5 to $6 50 per quarter. Papers one day old, are mailed at $4 62 a quarter. Many persons in England take second-hand newspapers, as the difference of a day in the age of the paper makes a difference of $7 50 a year in the price at which they are furnished by newsmen.

We know a blacksmith in this city (says a Cleveland paper) who clears ten dollars a day on an average, while one of his neighbors is starving on a profession. A very mischievous thing is pride. We know a lady who a dozen years ago could not endure the thought of her sons working at a trade. One of the young gents, is now officiating in the capacity of a quartermaster-general for a strolling music grinder, while the other is the foreman of an institution for blacking boots.

The Mayor of Marseilles has published a notice in the public journals to the effect that a large quantity of salted beef has just arrived in that port from America. The quality he states, is excellent, and the price to the consumer not more than 40 centimes (about 8 cents) the pound. All that is required, says the Mayor, is to steep it for 10 or 12 hours in water. The notice recommends the population to avail themselves of the opportunity thus offered of procuring wholesome meat for a reasonable rate.

Seth Wilmarth, proprietor of the Union Works, South Boston, has lately closed a contract with the New York and Erie Railroad Company for the building of forty locomotives of the largest class. The first of these machines is completed and is designated as "No. 166," and it is believed is the heaviest and largest locomotive ever built in New England. It weighs 32 tons, with four 5-feet drivers, 18-inch cylinder, 20-inch stroke.

One of the largest diamonds known has lately been deposited in the Bank of England, by a London house, to whom it was consigned from Rio Janeiro. It is valued at $250,000, and is said to be without a flaw. A poor negro slave might have been the owner, had he possessed the right to his own flesh and blood. The "chattel," on finding it, presented it to his master and received—his freedom as a reward.

England possesses more marine steam power in her royal navy than all the steam fleets of the world could furnish. A few years since England possessed only some 14,000 horse power; but on the 1st of January, 1854, the British navy included no less than 202 steam vessels of all classes; whilst the nominal steam power of machinery in those ships represented more than that of 55,300 horses, with a reserve of 2800 horse power available for other royal ships.

A great suit has been decided recently in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Four or five years a case has been pending between Cook and Grant, of Mason County, the former having poisoned a dog belonging to the latter. The ablest counsel in that part of the State was engaged, and the decisions of the various courts would fill a respectable octavo. By this last judgment Grant gets $49 and costs.

A new process of gilding or silvering lace and embroidery has been invented. The specimens are beautiful, rich, retaining all the delicacy of the thread. It will be a new means of ornamenting and embellishing dresses of ladies, vestments of Catholic priests, theatrical costumes, &c., and it will afford an opportunity for the diplomatic corps to enrich their fantastic disguise at a very cheap rate.

Experiments have proved that porous sand and other stones, when steeped for about 8 hours in hot coal-tar (160 Reaumur) acquire a greater degree of hardness and become impermeable to water. Bricks require only 4 hours, and the coal-tar a temperature of 90 degrees Reaumur to become hard as rock. The latter would answer best for sidewalks.

The largest church in Europe is at St. Petersburg. It was begun in 1771, and in twenty years two thousand men had not finished the walls. It is of polished marble both outside and in; the pillars are of one piece, fifty feet high, the base and capitals of solid silver; but the greatest curiosity of all is a wooden box, constructed to cover it from the weather.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal writes: "By simply wetting a silk handkerchief, and placing it over the face, a person can go through a dense smoke without inconvenience. I saw the statement about twenty years ago, and shortly after tried it, saving thousand of dollars by knowing where the fire was."

In Germany, when a train of cars stops at a way station the conductor not only proclaims the name of the place but also the length of time which the train will wait. This would be very convenient in this country, but in many cases the cars don't wait long enough to admit of giving such intimation after pronouncing a very long word.

One of the latest achievements in in manufactures from India rubber, is that of a Boston dentist, Dr. J. A. Cummings, who professes to have succeeded in producing entire sets of teeth, plate and dentals, of rubber, vulcanized to the hardness of ivory, and retaining the exactest possible adaptation to the mouth.

The Chicago Tribune says Douglas has three hundred substantial reasons for his bill to legalize slavery in Nebraska, in the shape of three hundred "fat negro slaves," which he owns upon his plantation down in Mississippi.

EDITED BY GEO. B. UTTER AND THOS. B. BROWN. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." TERMS--$2 00 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

VOL. X.—NO. 44. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 13, 1854. WHOLE NO. 512.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

It is indeed a blessed truth, revealed unto us by holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, that when creation shall be thus renewed, when its righteousness and bliss shall be restored, and when its Maker shall again behold His handywork once more "very good," the Sabbath of the Lord, commemorative of its completion, shall be regularly observed by all the nations of the earth. Explicit assurance is given of this by the same prophet, Isaiah, in a subsequent prediction—in which, in rapture, he returns to portray the character and privileges of Millennial times. In the very close of the prophecies he uttered in the Spirit, remonstrating again with Israel, the Lord sets forth their iniquities, and the iniquities of their fathers, while yet it is declared that He will not utterly destroy them, but that He should hereafter have a seed out of Jacob to serve Him, and out of Judah an inheritor of His mountains, and that His land shall yet be blessed for the enjoyment of those who shall have sought Him. (Is. lxv. 1—10.) Continuing His denunciations of wrath against the rebellious, God declares that such shall leave their names for a curse, and that He shall "call His servants by another name; that he who blesseth himself in the earth, shall bless himself in the God of truth; and he that sweareth in the earth, shall swear by the God of truth; because the former troubles are forgotten, and because they are hid from mine eyes." (Ver. 11—16.) The former troubles shall have been forgotten, when the sin of former times shall have ceased. The time of general righteousness, and therefore of abiding peace and blessedness, shall then have come. This period is pictured forth in most attractive colors; "for," exclaims Jehovah, "for, behold, I create new heavens, and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create; for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people; and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days; for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner, being an hundred years old, shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat; for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands. They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear. The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock; and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord." (Ver. 17—25.)

This, then, is another interesting and important representation of the period for which patriarchs, and prophets, and apostles, and saints of every age, have looked and longed; and which continues to be held forth to faith and hope, that we may be encouraged, and cheered, and strengthened in the good work of the Lord, during our pilgrimage, by the vision of coming purity and bliss. Renewed in every aspect, spiritual, moral, and physical, the world shall truly reflect the glory of its Lord. The thorn and the thistle shall cease to annoy, giving place to the spontaneous growth of the pine and the myrtle. The pristine harmony of creation, it is here again predicted, shall be restored in the earth. The instincts of animals, perverted so early on account of the sin of rebel man, to whose dominion, in his innocence, they had at first been absolutely committed, are now to be restored, and the creatures themselves to be replaced in their original subjection, and to enjoy their original security—the most carnivorous feeding on the growth of the earth, and the most ferocious yielding docilely to the gambols of the playful child; on the serpent alone, dust-eating shall continue to intimate the curse inflicted, in consequence of its being made instrumental in involving the human race in sin. As the days of a tree, (and trees there are, within and without the boundaries of Immanuel's land, remarkable for age,) shall be the lengthened life of the blessed of the Lord—to such shall likewise be accorded nearer converse and communion with their God—sorrow and sighing shall give place to universal joy and gladness—and Jerusalem, the city of the Great King, and the city of men's most hallowed associations and solemnities, shall be, to all, a rejoicing, and to all, shall her people be a joy.

Sad, and dark, and dreary, have been many of the scenes through which the church and the world have passed, in the bygone ages of rebellion and apostacy; but, in the age that is to come, iniquity, as ashamed, shall hide her head, and righteousness everywhere prevail; and he who blesseth himself in the earth, shall bless himself in the God of truth alone. Old things shall, indeed, have passed away; the glory of the new heavens and of the new earth shall wholly eclipse that of the heavens and the earth which are now—polluted as these have again become, even as were those which perished at the flood, and therefore reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. In view of that solemn fact and time, and expressly referring thereto, the Apostle Peter exclaims, "Nevertheless, we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." (2 Pet. iii. 5—13.) The promise of God by Isaiah, already quoted—and by Isaiah alone has this "promise" of the Lord been expressly recorded—gladdened the hearts of apostles and apostolic men, as it will cheer our hearts also, if we be of kindred spirit. As the heavens and the earth which were before the flood perished, so also, the apostle informs us, the heavens and the earth which are now, are destined to destruction likewise, not again by water, but by fire. But the apostolic consolation is, that we are divinely taught to look for "new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness;" and from the prophet through whom the promise is recorded, we learn that this will be when he creates Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy; when creation's curse shall be removed, and peace and blessedness shall prevail in the earth.

All glorious and blissful as is the scene so recorded by Isaiah, and quoted above, it is not a scene exclusively spiritual, nor of a nature pertaining to the condition of disembodied spirits, nor even of the state of resurrection saints. Not by those in the heavens above, but by those upon the earth, are the promised privileges to be enjoyed. It is the "Jerusalem" which has so long been left of her people, and been trodden under foot of her enemies, which is to be made "a rejoicing;" and it is her people that are to be then a joy. It is Israel in the flesh that shall build and plant, and enjoy the fruit of their labors. And although the days and months of infancy shall not be reckoned then as now, and although the days of God's elect shall be as the days of a tree, still "the child shall die" even if an hundred years old; and still, though changed in their instincts, the wolf and the lion, as well as the lamb and the bullock, shall not only be preserved and retain their place in the earth with men, but they all shall partake of the food they fed upon when first they came from their Maker's hand.

Adopting the same strain, and in continuation of the same theme, the prophet, in the ensuing and concluding chapter of his book, again remonstrates with those in Israel who rebel against the Lord; while, again, also, he comforts those who "tremble at His word." To the latter, the prophet says in the name of the Lord, "Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified; but He shall appear, to your joy, and they shall be ashamed." (Is. lxvi. 4, 5.) A promise follows of the restoration of Israel to their own land, and of comfort to Jerusalem, when "the Lord will come with fire, and with His chariots like a whirlwind, to render His anger with fury, and His rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire, and by His sword, will the Lord plead with all flesh; and the slain of the Lord shall be many. They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the Lord." (Ver. 5—17.) As here the prophet says "the Lord will come with fire," and that He will "render His anger with fury;" so Paul also testifies, that "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." (2 Thess. 1, 7, 8.) He comes taking vengeance; for as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. He will, however, gather out of His kingdom all things that offend, when the world shall receive times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

Having vindicated His righteousness against the workers of iniquity, Jehovah, by the prophet, exclaims in continuation from the verses previously quoted, "It shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come and see my glory. And I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarshish, Pul and Lud, that draw the bow, to Zubal and Javan, to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, nor seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles. And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations, upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the Lord, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the Lord. And I will also take of them for priests and for Levites, saith the Lord." (Is. lxvi. 18—21.) Measures are thus provided for making known the glory of the Lord unto distant nations, and for bringing back His people to the Land of Promise, and to God's "holy mountain." Assurance of blessing being thus renewed, both to Israel and to the Gentiles, the place formerly assigned to the Levites also is retained for them, as already we have seen from the statements in the concluding prophecies of Ezekiel.

In this connection it is, that, in the last words of his book, Isaiah exclaims, "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord. And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." (Ver. 22—24.) The name and place of Israel and the Levites, the Lord is thus pledged to continue, so long as the new heavens and the new earth remain, while the world's inhabitants, of every clime, come up to worship the Lord, manifested in His glory, "from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another." This is the blessed termination of past and present rebellion—the rectification of sin's disorders. Bright is the picture; and pleasing it is, even in anticipation, to behold a world renewed materially, intellectually, morally, and spiritually; redeemed from sin and from Satan's usurpation, and visibly ruled and reigned over in righteousness by the Son of God as the Son of man. And the earth now once more purged from pollution, and highly privileged, again shall God receive aright the homage of His creatures, at all times, but especially manifested at the periods of New Moon and in the holy Sabbath; and graciously does He promise to accept the sincere services then to be presented upon both.

In reference to the New Moons, we may remark, that, among other purposes of God in the creation of the sun and moon, it is stated that both were to be "for signs and for seasons." (Gen. i. 18; Ps. civ. 19.) And in Israel's law He appointed at New Moon the service of trumpet-blowing, together with the offering of special sacrifices. (Numb. x. 10; xxviii. 11; Ps. lxxxi. 3.) It is not consistent with our present purpose to enter upon a consideration of the signification of such rites; but we notice that that season, as well as the Sabbath, was used by His people, as we learn from their Scripture history, for worship and religious instruction, in other places besides the temple. (2 Kings iv. 23.) Having, however, equally with the Sabbath, been perverted from its rightful place and use by Israel's hypocritical services, equally when this was the case, were its services also rejected. But the faithful observance of these seasons in the divinely appointed manner, has as truly been required of them. And we have already seen, from the prophecies of Ezekiel, that in those Millennial times of which we here speak, the New Moon shall indeed continue to hold its sacred place together with the Sabbath of the Lord, in Israel's appointed solemn services. (Ezek. xlvi. 1, 3, 6; xiv. 17.) And we farther learn from the statement of Isaiah now before us, that so far from this observance of the New Moon being confined to the house of Israel in the blissful times of the coming age, that then shall "all flesh" come to worship before the Lord, "from one New Moon to another."

DEATH OF A GOOD MAN.

Rev. Thomas Stratten, of Hull, England, was recently called to his reward. The medical men were not apprehensive of fatal results until the latter part of the week; and he himself was not early aware of his nearness to eternity; but he was ready, as one who was watching for the "coming of his Lord;" and on first learning the fatal nature of his illness, observed, "Blessed hope of the Gospel! I have nothing to do now but to fall into the eternal arms of Love that are underneath me."

On its being said to him, "This is Sabbath morning," he replied, "I shall ask no more questions now about time; it is eternity I have to do with! Happy Sabbath, that shall never end!" He expressed his own feelings also in that verse:

"A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
On thy kind arms I fall;
Thou art my strength and righteousness,
My Jesus and my all.

About the time that his beloved flock were uniting in the hymn of praise in the sanctuary, and but a few hours before his departure, he said:

"Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now"— repeating the last line again and again.

In the closing hours of his life he was unable to speak, but was conscious to the end, and as texts of Scripture were repeated, gently raised his hands.

A few minutes before his death, one of his children said to him, "Jesus is with you, father?" He gently pressed the hand which was in his; and then, his breathing becoming gradually more feeble and at longer intervals, without a sigh or struggle, his soul departed, as a child that falls asleep in the arms of a kind and tender parent.

RELIGION AND POLITICS.

The celebrated Robert Hall, in his admirable article entitled "Christianity consistent with a love of Freedom," uttered the following opinions, which are especially pertinent to the present state of affairs among us:—

"Though Christianity does not assume any immediate direction in the affairs of government, it inculcates those duties and recommends that spirit which will ever prompt us to cherish the principles of freedom. It teaches us to check every selfish passion, to consider ourselves as parts of a great community, and to abound in all the fruits of an active benevolence. The particular operation of this principle will be regulated by circumstances as they arise, but our obligation to cultivate it is clear. If we are bound to protect a neighbor or even an enemy from violence, to give him raiment when he is naked, or food when he is hungry, much more ought we [ministers] to do our part toward the preservation of a free government, the only basis on which the enjoyment of these blessings can securely rest. He who breaks the fetters of slavery and delivers a nation from thraldom, forms, in my opinion, the noblest comment on the great law of love, whilst he distributes the greatest blessing which man can receive from man; but next to that is the merit of him who, in times like the present, watches over the edifice of public liberty, repairs its foundations, and strengthens its cement when he beholds it hastening to decay."

The pious Jonathan Edwards describes a Christian as being like "such a little flower as we see in the spring of the year, low and humble on the ground; opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory; rejoicing, as it were, in a calm rapture; diffusing around its fragrance; standing peacefully and lowly in the midst of other flowers." The world may think nothing of the little flower—they may not even notice it; but nevertheless it will be diffusing around a sweet fragrance upon all who dwell within its lowly sphere.

GREEN PASTURES AND STILL WATERS.

"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters."

Where the softly flowing waters
  Murmur on the silent air,
There my Saviour gently leads me,
  To His pastures green and fair.

There no dark, unholy passion,
  Can disturb my peaceful breast;
By His hand sustained and guided,
  'Neath his wings my soul can rest.

When my heart is sad and weary,
  Then His cheering voice I hear:
"Fainting soul, renew thy courage—
  I am with thee—never fear."

When my roving feet have wandered
  From the strait and narrow way;
When hope's radiant wings are drooping—
  Clouded faith's clear beaming ray;

Then he pleads, in accents tender,
  "Weary spirit, come to me;
Though thy sins may be as scarlet,
  By my blood thou canst be free."

When the dark, tempestuous ocean,
  Of life's sorrow, care, and fear,
Rolls around me in its fury,
  Then my Saviour 's ever near.

'Tis His hand supports and guides me;
  'Tis his voice dispels my gloom;
And when this life's cares are ended,
  He will lead me to the tomb.

INFANT ASYLUMS OF PARIS.

Communicated to The Independent by a French lady.

Of the many institutions of charity with which Paris abounds, one of the latest is an establishment at which poor women, who are obliged to go out to work, may leave their infants to be taken care of during the day. It is not a Foundling Hospital, but a place of safe-keeping for the children of poor but honest mothers. It is called the Creche, which signifies literally a manger, and is taken from the nativity of Christ. The name is explained by a passage of Scripture inscribed on the walls: "They wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger." Humane and benevolent ladies of the city have long felt the want of such an institution, which should relieve the burden of the overtasked workwoman, but without taking away her child, or discharging her from all maternal duties, or robbing the domestic circle of that soft influence which is exerted by the presence of infancy. More than fifteen years' experience have shown the importance and utility of this work in Paris, where it has extended with great rapidity, and where its happy influence has been proved by the diminution of mortality among children, as well as by the moral improvement of mothers.

The organization of these Creches—which thus bear the name of the first cradle of our Saviour—has been, as it should be, the work of woman. A contribution of a small sum gives to each member the title and privilege of an inspectress. At an annual meeting are chosen the ladies of the committee, to whom are made the reports of the secretary and treasurer, and of the physicians who visit the houses daily, and whose medical advice is offered gratuitously. The only services which are paid are those of the nurses, who are appointed to each establishment to the number of four or five for thirty children. These women are responsible for any infringement of the rules, and are subject to the censure of the lady inspectresses, and of the physicians, who record their opinions upon the temperature of the hall, the cleanliness of the children, and the attendance and care of the nurses, in a register, which is open to the inspection of every visitor.

Placed always as nearly as possible in the center of a district of the working population, this infant asylum presents the most pleasing and attractive spectacle, and often appears as a refreshing oasis in the midst of the miserable dwellings which surround it. On every side of a large hall—the windows of which give free entrance to the air and the sun—are ranged little cradles, with curtains white as snow. Cages full of singing-birds are suspended from the walls, which enliven the place with their joyous notes, and sometimes musical-boxes are kept playing; for it was soon found that infants, taken from the songs and prattle of their mothers, pined and grew sickly under the influence of silence and repose.

Each cradle is designated by a number, to which is attached the name of the member whose annual contribution has provided for its endowment and support. Sometimes only the initials are given, but more often the name of a beloved child, whose mother, full of happiness, has felt her heart overflow in this work of love and charity; or, alas! who may have been led to this act of pity by her grief for one that is lost, and who writes the name of her dead child over the cradle of the poor. Thus ladies of the richest families, drawn by opposite motives, meet in this common charity. Here the happy mother, after having attended to the duties of love in her own nursery, comes to watch with a vigilant eye over the care given to the offspring of poverty and want; while the black vail and mourning robe tell that the broken-hearted mother finds, in this care for others' children, a balm to soothe her sorrow for her own.

The Cheche is not a mere gift of alms to the poor. It is a help to the hard-working woman; but it does not take from her all responsibility for the care of her child; and the trifling tax of two cents a day is paid in every case, except those of most extreme poverty.

From six o'clock in the morning the doors are open, and the mother enters with her little one in her arms, and after a last kiss and caress, goes to her work, leaving it in the care of the nurses. The child is immediately unburdened of the poor garment which often scarcely covers it, and put in a bath, and dressed in the clothing of the institution, which is furnished in abundance by free gifts. The baby is then laid softly in a cradle, or left to roll and creep, and take his infantile sport on a large matting which is spread across the whole length of the apartment.

The sunniest time of the day is at the return of the mothers. At noon they are free from labor for an hour, and hasten to discharge the sweet offices of maternity. Saved from all fear of accident, or of long hours of crying and pain, to the little being left behind, they have worked with new courage, and now, in this hour of rest, they experience the full bliss of being mothers. The infants, lying in their nests, hear the steps and voices of the mothers approaching, and raise their little heads like so many young birds. It is beautiful to see the mother go to her child, take it up in her arms, and talk to it in that sweet language which a mother only can use. With what true instinct does the infant recognize the maternal voice! Its eye lights up with intelligence, its little arms are extended, and it offers its lips to be kissed, even before seeking the mother's breast.

In such a work of charity there is a real poetry; and it naturally assumes the most graceful forms. Thus, in all prosperous families of Paris, the contributionto the Creche is an annual gift which is never forgotten; but by common consent it is placed under the patronage of the children. It is their name that is inscribed over the cradle of the poor, and it is their little purse which furnishes the greatest part of the funds necessary for its support. The piece of gold, given by an indulgent grandfather on New Year's day, is no longer spent on a useless toy, but is laid aside for a cradle. The little girl, seated at her mother's side, strives with new zeal to become initiated into the mysteries of sewing—for her great ambition is to complete, herself alone, a little wardrobe for the babies. A visit to the Creche is a reward for long days of study.

How many times have we seen joyous bands of children enter, with an eager, yet timid and respectful air, bringing each a tribute of needle-work, or some playthings! With what curious interest did they approach their cradle—gazing at the child sleeping in it, and for whose well-being they have been able to do something!

And it is not a small thing that this work of charity thus engages the sympathy of children. There are but few scenes of poverty and suffering on which they can look with impunity. For the pauperism of large cities is so mixed up with vice, that no wise parent would dare to take a child to look upon all that wretchedness. Let this new work, which is now commencing in this country, be their charity. Let this be the first tie which shall unite them to suffering humanity. Let it be their first school of self-denial, and of devotion to the relief of others.

DR. DUFF AND HIS BIBLE.

Dr. Duff, as is well known, was the first missionary ever sent to heathen lands by the Church of Scotland in its organized capacity. Up to the time of his sailing for his foreign field, all things seemed to have been propitious. The winds and the waves, however, were permitted to test his resolution and to try his faith. The following incident, from which he educed lessons of practical instruction, will be found interesting:

No sooner had he embarked, than that gracious God who has "the times and the seasons" engraven in the roll of Providence, caused the day of visitation and of trial to arise. Seldom has there been a voyage, from first to last, so fraught with disaster and discipline; within the "floating home" of the deep, a fiery furnace from the combustion of evil tongues and wicked hearts; without, unusual vicissitudes of tempest and of danger. These, however, were but the beginnings of trouble—the first wavings of the rod of chastisement, to prepare for the crushing stroke. On Saturday night, the 13th of February, the vessel violently struck on the rocks of an uninhabited barren strand, about thirty miles north of Cape Town. With the utmost difficulty, the passengers and crew escaped with their lives. The noble vessel soon went to pieces, and almost every thing on board perished. The losses of the missionary were such as could not easily be recovered. Besides the loss of personal property, from a collection of books, in every department of knowledge, amounting to upwards of eight hundred distinct works, only a few odd volumes were picked up on the beach; most of them so shattered, or reduced to a state of pulp, as to be of little or no value. But what was felt most, as being to him irreparable, was the entire loss of all his journals, notes, memorandums, essays, &c.—the fruits, such as they were, of the reflection and research of many years, when he possessed special opportunities which he could never expect again to realize. "But they are gone," was his own written declaration at the time, "they are gone; and blessed be God I can say 'gone' without a murmur. So perish all earthly things; the treasure that is laid up in heaven alone is unassailable. God has been to me a God full of mercy; and not the least of his mercies do I find in the cheerful resignation with which he now enables me to feel and to say, 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.'"

The only article which was recovered in a wholly undamaged state, was a quarto copy of Bagster's Comprehensive Bible and Psalm Book; which, as the parting memorial of a few dear friends, had been carefully wrapped up in leather, and thus escaped uninjured by the waters of the briny deep. Ah! the lesson and the schooling of a mysterious Providence seemed now complete, and its designs and intentions perfectly developed. He who had thought that he had "sifted" his heart "as wheat," and could find no engrossing idol lurking there, now discovered, that he had been, to a degree never previously imagined, a wholesale idolater of books and written papers! It seemed as if the heavens had suddenly opened, and a voice from the Holy One had sounded with resistless emphasis in his ears, "Fool that you are, to have centered so unduly your cares, and anxieties, and affections, on books and papers! So intense and devoted was the homage of your heart towards these, in the eyes of the heart-searching God, that, as there seemed no other method of weaning you from them, your Heavenly Fathers, to save you from the doom of an idolater, has, in mercy to your soul, removed the idols—sinking them all to the bottom of the deep, or scattering them in useless fragments on this desolate shore, all, all, save one, and that is the ever-blessed Book of Life. Here is the Bible for you; grasp it as the richest treasure of infinite wisdom and infinite love—a treasure which, in the balance of Heaven, would outweigh all the books and papers in the universe. Go, and prayerfully consult that unerring chart, that infallible directory; humbly trust to it, and to your God; and never, never will you have reason to regret that you have been violently severed from your idols, as thereby you become more firmly linked by the golden chain of grace to the throne Eternal." Assuredly, had Jehovah himself, in terms such as these, addressed the poor trembling, convicted idolater, in accents of thunder, when standing apart on that dreary African strand, the gracious design of Providence could not have been more distincily interpreted, nor the precious lesson more ineffaceably engraven on the inner table of the soul.

AN IMPRESSIVE LESSON.

"Be sure your sin will find you out," was the admonition of the Hebrew lawgiver to two of the tribes of Israel, who he had reason to fear might be tempted to deal unfairly with their brethren. The admonition conveys a truth which, with but rare exceptions, has held good in all ages, and among all people. Recently it has been most impressively enforced in the infamous career and tragical death of Dr. George A. Gardiner. This individual is represented as a man of good appearance and education, and from the vast scheme of fraud which he conceived and carried through with perfect success, it is evident that he possessed talents which, rightfully applied, might have earned for him an honorable position among men. But he chose a career of guilt, and he has received his reward. By an ingenious and elaborate series of forgeries and frauds, he obtained from the Mexican commission nearly half a million of dollars, and left this country for Europe, without a suspicion resting upon him. After paying his counsel and other claims, he was able to leave some $200,000 subject to his order, in Washington and New York. His success seemed complete, and his security beyond a doubt. But while he was abroad, a new clerk happened to enter into the service of the Mexican commissioners—a man who had lived fifteen years in Mexico. It also happened to fall to the duty of this clerk to file away the various papers belonging to the commission, and among them the Gardiner documents. It happened, too, that the clerk's attention was at once arrested by the palpable evidence of fraud, in the vouchers of Dr. Gardiner. A thorough examination satisfied him that the whole claim was a gross fraud. His suspicions were communicated to government, and measures were taken to investigate the affair. An injunction was laid upon a considerable portion of the money Gardiner had left in bank. He returned, was indicted, and took his trial; but he was so ably defended, and his plot had been so carefully laid, that the jury were staggered, and could not agree. On a second trial, he was convicted, and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. The next stage in the drama was his suicide—a terrible confession of the justice of his sentence, and an awful blow to the friends who had stood by him through the prosecution. The wretched man died with a lie in his mouth, as the physicians who made a chemical analysis of the contents of the stomach, testified to finding strichnine and brucine in quantities more than sufficient to destroy life. Pieces of paper were also found in the stomach, which had been used as inclosures for the poison, and were much worn from being carried long in the pocket.

The admonition which this event carries with it, was well expressed by Judge Crawford, pronouncing sentence upon the criminal: "The unexampled ingenuity of the net-work spread out on this trial, and the fact that it has been exposed at the last stage, ought not to fail of a beneficial effect in convincing all men, that if they will trample on laws human and divine, they shall suffer for it."

THE SAILOR'S HOME.

After the recent heavy storm on the coast of Massachusetts, a sailor's chest, which had been swept from some wrecked vessel, was cast on shore, and opened by those who found it. A narrator says:—

"But we found a precious treasure in the sailor's chest. No diamond of Brazil—no gem of the western coast. So precious, yea, the price of it was above rubies. It was the word of God. We were glad to see it. The sight of it sent a tide of pleasant thoughts through our hearts. If we knew not where the tempest had sent the body, we could not but hope this precious Bible had sent the spirit to a heavenly home. No name yet met our eyes. But these beautiful lines, cut out of some book or periodical, were pasted on the fly leaf:

'A parent's blessing on her son,
  Goes with this holy thing;
The love that would retain the one,
  Must to the other cling.
Remember, 'tis no common toy,
  A mother's gift!—remember, boy.'

"In company with the Bible we found a daguerreotype of a lady—beyond question the mother of that son; the giver of that precious book. As we gazed on the placid features, we could not but think those beautiful lines were placed there by her whose image was now before us. Her own fond and pious heart had made this gift, and sought an expression of maternal love in these lines. A pious mother's blessing with such a gift!"

Genius without judgment, or judgment without genius, only makes half a character; it is the combination of genius to create, with the judgment to control, that forms the truly great man. Charles XII. was a specimen of genius without judgment.

BAPTISM—ITS DESIGN.

The ordinance of Baptism, as it stands connected with the Christian dispensation, is a figure of death and the resurrection. The hope of Christianity is a hope of a glorious resurrection and a blissful immortality beyond the grave.

The apostle Paul, in arguing the question of the resurrection, in 1 Cor. xvi, manifestly gives this view of the doctrine. He says: "Else what shall they do, who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?" No interpretation of this passage seems so clear and satisfactory as the one which makes baptism a figure of death and the resurrection. By the inquiry the apostle raises, he shows the inconsistency of the docrine which declares that "there is no resurrection of the dead." Why is baptism given as a figure of the resurrection, if there is to be none. Baptism would be destitute of its significance, if robbed of its application to the resurrection. Such is the sense given of it in the argument from which we have made the quotation.

The same view is taken of baptism by the apostle in Romans vi. 3-6. "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? Wherefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." The doctrines of death, burial, and resurrection, are so clearly brought out in connection with the doctrine of baptism, that we can not fail to see that they are inseparably blended. We are buried by baptism. We rise from that burial to newness of life in Christ. The apostle, as if fearful that the idea might not be appreciated, adds the familiar fact of planting seed for the production of plants. So in baptism, we are planted, we are buried; from that planting and burial springs up the spiritual life in Christ. No figure or act could be more expressive of death and resurrection than this.

In writing to the Collossians, an Apostle uses similar language. "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him, through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." Col. ii. 12.

The Apostle Peter also, in 1 Peter iii. 21, 22, presents the same thought in the language, "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us, (not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God."

All these passages we have now quoted teach the same thing—that baptism is a figure of death, burial, and resurrection. The apostles would not have so blended their subjects, if there did not exist a necessary and fit connection between them.

The Saviour himself, unquestionably, refers to this connection between baptism and death and resurrection when he says, (Luke xii, 50.) "But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished." He was looking forward to the great crisis in his mission, when he should be overwhelmed, baptized, immersed, in his sufferings and in death.

In addition to these scripture proofs, the form of baptism is very suggestive of the doctrine of burial and resurrection. The disciple is buried in the liquid grave by baptism. This act fitly represents his deadness to the world, and burial or separation from it. He rises from this baptism or burial, not to the world, but into the church, a separated, baptized disciple of Christ; or, as an Apostle expresses it, in newness of life. This is the institution which the Saviour has chosen to mark the separation of his church from the world. The believer is baptized out of the sinful world into the church of God. He is also buried out of or from the world in death, and rises in the resurrection to immortality and eternal life in the church in heaven. Nothing can be more expressive of the Christian's faith and hope in the promise of eternal life, than his ready submission to "burial by baptism," and his walking thereafter "in newness of life" in the church on earth. Considered in this light, the ordinance of baptism is robed with glory and beauty that it could not otherwise have. It is peculiarly expressive and significant.

It was undoubtedly for this purpose that Jesus Christ chose and appointed it as the initiatory service in his church. There is no other visible door into the church; and this is a complete and sufficient one. All other forms added to this, in initiating members into the church, take just so much from the ordinance of baptism, and leave it stripped in part of its impressive character. We have no account in the Gospel of any other service in receiving members into the church. The addition of other services between baptism and church membership, seems much like the adroit slipping in by the Romish church of purgatory between death and the kingdom of heaven. They are all inventions framed by the skillful hand of man to complete what Jesus Christ made perfect. As there is "no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave," before the resurrection to everlasting life, so in baptism, which is a figure of death and resurrection, there are no services necessary after its burial in water before rising to life and a place in the church of Christ on earth.

One practical lesson to be learned from this view of the ordinance of baptism is, that each baptized believer should regard himself as belonging to the church of God, and bound by his initiation into it, to keep himself pure and free from sin; and that he is no longer at liberty to live in sin, since by his burial he has signified his deadness to it, and his newness of life in Christ. COMMUNION AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

Some few weeks since, I noticed an article in the Sabbath Recorder, headed Communion, over the signature of S. S. Griswold. Referring to his early education and subsequent reflections upon this subject, he says, he has found it difficult to reconcile his mind to what is termed restricted communion. His conformity with the usage of the denomination with which he is connected has subjected his conscience to a severe trial. I was almost persuaded that the article was intended rather as a 'feeler' than otherwise. But on reading a subsequent article by the same writer, published in the Recorder of March 30th, I came to the conclusion that he has serious scruples in regard to his present practice. The subject is sufficiently important to have given to it serious and candid attention. It has, as every thing else has, a right and a wrong side.

The writer states that the Passover, in the Jewish national church, was enjoined upon all the members of the family of Israel, as a memorial of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage; and he seems to think it is analogous to the institution of the Lord's Supper, as a memorial of a spiritual deliverance which Christ was to accomplish for them in the world. I think brother G. has mistaken the event to be commemorated by the Passover. I know not as it is any where said in the Scriptures, that the Passover was designed to commemorate the deliverance from Egyptian bondage, nor the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, as some suppose; but to commemorate the immunity of the children of Israel, on whose houses the blood of the lamb was found when the angel passed them, and destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians—the angel of death passing over them. The term passover was called by the Latins and Greeks, pascha not from the Greek pascho, to suffer, but from the Hebrew word pesach, a passing over, a sparing, immunity from suffering; and it is so stated in Exodus 12: 26, 27—"And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean you by this service? that ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord's Passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses." In like manner it is represented by the apostle to the Hebrews, (ch. 11: 28,) "By faith he kept the Passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them." And in a similar sense it is expressed by the apostle, (1 Cor. 5: 7,) "For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." So that "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus" obtains an exemption from the punishment of sin for such as truly believe in him, while this punishment falls upon all who believe not. Neither does it appear that the Lord's Supper was designed to commemorate our deliverance from the bondage of sin, but the death of Christ, through which this deliverance is obtained. Thus the main feature of the analogy between the two institutions is, at best, but hypothetical; and is by no means a proper ground on which to determine who are the proper subjects of the communion of the Lord's Supper.

Neither is there any analogy between the members of the Jewish commonwealth and the members of Christ's mystical body. The congregation of Israel may be called a church in the sense intended by Stephen, Acts 7: 38. The ecclesia, here rendered church, signified nothing more than the congregation, and should have been so translated into English. It is in vain that we seek for an analogous relationship between the enslaved Israelites in Egypt, and the members of the gospel church. They were not a religious people, and had no religious ordinances nor institutions given to them; for circumcision was but a national rite, and had no other prospective bearing than an inheritance in the land of Judea. And why does our brother call eating the Jewish Passover a communion? What communion was there in eating this feast? And he says the Passover was given to the Jewish church irrespective of its sectarian divisions. How a people who had no religion, or at most no religious theory, could have sectarian divisions among them, is difficult to tell. And to conclude from such a gratuitous assumption, that the Lord's Supper was given to the Christian church, irrespective of its sectarian divisions, is in my opinion illogical and unreasonable.

The Lord's Supper was detached and independent of all previous Jewish institutions. It was instituted by Christ as a memorial of his sufferings, and given only to his disciples. And our brother says it was given to them irrespective of their sectarian divisions. He thus assumes that there were sectarian divisions among the twelve apostles as early as the institution of this ordinance. Now, by what record does it appear that this was the case? Upon what doctrines or duties of religion did they differ? If he knows of none, why does he assume that they existed? Such reasoning from inference and analogy, when explaining and enforcing the institutions of the Christian religion, has already wrought immense injury to the cause and interests of religion in the Christian church. One would think that we, as a denomination, had seen and felt quite enough of this mischievous work. No one can doubt that there was a unity among the disciples at the time of the institution of the Lord's Supper, unless the case of Judas was an exception; and, so far as we are informed, this unity continued a considerable time after the ascension of Christ; so that we cannot infer from the institution any thing by which we can determine who are the proper recipients of this Supper, when the condition of the church is so widely different, as it now is.

From 1 Cor. 10: 16, and 11: 24, 25, Bro. Griswold infers that the Lord's Supper is no test of fellowship, except that of Christians with their Saviour; and no communion, except that of the blood and body of Christ. If, indeed, he thus views the design and use of this ordinance, it is difficult to imagine how his conscience could be so severely tried in conformity to what he calls restricted communion. For the view he takes of it, restricts it to its narrowest possible limits. I have supposed that those who acknowledge no intercommunion with others in this ordinance, could hardly have cause of grief on account of a restricted communion; especially when the celebration of the ordinance is extended to all the members of the church, and to all the churches in the connection. If there is no test of fraternal fellowship in partaking of the Supper with others, then there is no test of disfellowship in refusing communion with them, and no just reason for complaint of a want of charity to others, when a body of Christians think it proper to restrict the communion to the limits within which their church discipline is acknowledged.

That the bread and wine used in the eucharist are the communion of the body and blood of Christ, I do most heartily admit, and also that we should eat these emblems of his body and blood in memory of him; and further, that it is the duty of every communicant to examine himself in anticipation of the Supper. But does it follow that we are to be indifferent as to the moral and spiritual condition of those with whom we receive these emblems? Certainly not. Bro. G. would assuredly examine his brother, were he to ask for baptism, or membership in the church, and satisfy himself that he was a genuine disciple of Christ, before he would administer the ordinance to him, or admit him into the church. And if he should have to labor with a delinquent brother, he would certainly think it his duty to examine him in relation to his penitence and intentions for the future, before he would restore him to his fellowship, and bid him God speed. If, then, in these things, we feel bound to examine others, how can we exonerate ourselves from this duty when called upon to administer the Lord's Supper, of which to eat and drink unworthily exposes the delinquent to his own certain condemnation. EGYPTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

Few of the readers of the Recorder are aware of the existence of such rare and curious relics of antiquity as are embraced in the collection of Dr. Henry Abbott, now on exhibition at No. 659 Broadway, New York. Here is the statue of Pharoah, king of Egypt, which was undoubtedly made by sculptors who were familiar with the facts, if not eye-witnesses of the destruction in the Red Sea of the hosts of the king. Here may be seen the HELMET of SHISHAK, king of Egypt, which was worn nine hundred and seventy-one years before Christ, by the individual who took Jerusalem from Rehoboam, (see 2 Chronicles xii,) and carried away the treasures of the temple. This helmet was taken from one of the tombs of the ancient kings by Dr. Abbott, and has the name of Shishak on the frontlet. Here may be seen bricks, made with and without straw, which, being entombed with the bodies of men of Pharaoh's time, may be the identical bricks made by the children of Israel during their hard bondage in Egypt. Here may be seen also the gold necklace and ear-rings of Menes, the first Pharoah of Egypt, and the earliest king in history; also the gold signet of Cheops, the builder of the great Pyramid, two thousand three hundred and fifty-two years before Christ. Here are ladies' thread and needles, pins and scissors, combs and tablets, pens of reed and papyrus, glass ornaments similar to the fancy paper weights of modern times, and quite as curious. There are eleven hundred and nine lots of specimens in this collection, and they are the most valuable and authentic specimens to be found in the world.

Every student of the Bible ought to examine these relics of Old Testament times. They will serve to strengthen the confidence he may have in the history of the nation of Israel, and their transactions with Egypt. Dr. Abbott was in Cairo, Egypt, for twenty years, during which time he exercised the function of physician to some of the first men in Egypt, as well as to the Pasha himself. It was by this that he was able to bring away so large and valuable a collection of the ancient treasures of that famous country. This most remarkable museum is about to close, and the question begins to excite the attention of some of our citizens, whether there should not be an effort made to secure the collection permanently to this city. Peter Cooper has generously offered a room in his Institute when completed, for its perpetual free exhibition, and subscriptions are on foot to secure the means of purchasing the entire collection at the estimated value, (sixty thousand dollars,) and make it, as it ought to be, one of the attractions of our city. Then the land of Egypt would be seen by the traveler in the old world, but the treasures of Egypt could only be seen in the metropolis of the new world. There would be the land, but here the implement, of those who

LETTERS FROM CHINA.

On Fourth-day of last week, (just in time for the Board Meeting on Fifth-day,) we received, via Marseilles, a letter from Bro. Solomon Carpenter, dated Shanghae, Jan. 19, 1854. Three days later we received, via San Francisco, a letter from Bro. Nathan Wardner, bearing the same date. At that time our brethren with their families were in usual health, and prosecuting their missionary work so far as the unsettled state of the country would permit. They had just learned, (from a report of the Anniversaries published in the Sabbath Recorder,) that a letter of credit for £300 had been sent them; concerning which they felt considerable anxiety, inasmuch as it had not come to hand, and would be of little use to them if received. But their anxiety was entirely unnecessary. The letter expires by its own limitation in one year from its date, and it cost nothing except the trouble of giving security to the banker that the money will be paid if the letter is used; so that whether it comes to hand or not is a matter of small importance. Besides, soon after sending the letter it was deemed best, in view of the unsettled state of the country, to send also a box of dollars, which they must have received by the bark Storm a few weeks after writing to us. Another box of dollars will be sent them in a few days by a ship sailing to Shanghae direct. From the letter of Bro. Carpenter we copy several paragraphs of general interest. Concerning his own labors, he says:—

"For the last three months and a half I have found but little opportunity for preaching, and begin to read the designs of Providence in impressing upon my mind, about a year ago, the necessity of going out daily into the highways and hedges to compel them to come in. Here on the foreign ground there is too much bustle of business to allow of much opportunity to reason with them about anything not pertaining to this life. And if we wander but little into the surrounding country, we are liable at any time to be shot at by the imperial troops. While thus debarred from preaching, I have found enough to do in the line of learning the mandarin dialect. This is the only spoken language which is generally understood, especially among scholars, and in many provinces among the common people. Before I got Tong out of the city, I hired a teacher who is a native of Nankin for about a month. Now Tong is assisting me to acquire it."

In relation to the progress of the revolution, Mr. Carpenter says:—

"Shanghae is still a battle-field. Here are two belligerent parties, neither of which seem disposed to give up the struggle. It is pretty generally believed at present, that the insurgents here have acted independently of Tae Ping Waung. Their doctrine and practice are different. These are idol worshipers and opium smokers. Their numbers for a few weeks have been diminishing. Several hundreds, tired of the business, have made good their escape. About the first of this month they put to death, it is said, one hundred and eighty-nine of their own men, for a treacherous attempt to deliver up the city. Sometimes, upon the approach of the imperial troops, they leave the city wall, their citadel, and sally out to meet their foe on an even footing. In this way they have lost not a few. Last Sixth-day they had a severe contest of this sort. The imperialists did the best execution with their bows and arrows. They can shoot nearer the mark in this way than with guns, which they touch off with a torch, with averted heads. The imperial troops make their attacks more by night than by day, showing that in more senses than one they love darkness better than light. Now while I am writing their guns are constantly saluting our ears, many of them at a distance of less than half a mile. But finding they had but little prospect of being able to force their way into the city, their main reliance now seems to be the starvation system. They are endeavoring to cut off supplies from entering the city from any quarter, thus trying to starve to death the insurgents, together with all the people who are so unfortunate as to be shut up within the city walls.

Only foreigners are allowed ingress and egress, and this not without some difficulty and some partiality. On account of certain acts of our Vice Consul at the time of the taking of the city, we Americans find it more difficult to gain access to the city than other foreigners. But I have succeeded in getting access on three occasions since I last wrote. The last time was last First-day, the 15th inst., when I made it the object of my visit to call upon several families of our acquaintance, and also see what was the general state of suffering in the city. I found there were still provisions in the market places, but many of the poor, whose business had been suspended for four months, had not the means to buy their necessary food, and had no other prospect before them, as they said, but to starve to death. And after selling off their effects at a trifling price, as a last resort, little preferable to death, of which it is the usual precursor, not a few of those who, in ordinary times, were well able to take care of themselves, had already taken the humiliating position of beggars. None of our friends of the Chung family, however, had yet been reduced to that extremity. But they were prepared to receive with heart-felt thankfulness the little aid tendered them. Ne-May appeared much more care-worn than when I saw her before. Her father in-law, Mr. Lo, the old gentleman who used to be so prejudiced against foreigners that we hardly expected he would ever welcome us to his house, was very glad to see me. His son, the husband of Ne-May, went with me to the house of Nya, a daughter of Ana, the blind grandmother of whom you have known something. Ana was glad to hear my voice and to press my hand, and heartily did she wish through me to salute Kea nyang nyang. Commending her to the protection of our heavenly Father, I went to another part of the city, and called a moment to see another daughter of Ana, widow Chung, the mother of my former teacher Chung. She appeared to be rather more destitute than either of the other families. Rev. Mr. Pearcy was with me in all these visits, and others which I have not here named. Our house had received no further injury since I had last seen it. Five balls had entered, and one struck the house and did not enter. All that entered, except one, came in at the windows—two of them two-pounders, and one an eighteen-pounder. This passed through the Venetian window, musqueto netting, two doors, a lath and plaster partition, dividing a stud, and passed obliquely into the outside wall of the house, which was fourteen inches thick and well built, making a hole quite through, and, having expended its force, like other kings, it settled down upon a throne of rubbish, enveloped by a dense cloud of dust, all the desolation of its own creating, quite contented at having made a noise in the world.

We have no very recent or reliable news from the north. The latest intelligence is that there is some dissension in the cabinet, that the young Emperor Ya Fong had retired to some place, and that one of his uncles was aspiring to be Emperor. There is no opportunity yet for us safely to undertake a trip to Chung Keang or Nankin. Rev. J. J. Roberts, who considers himself the religious teacher elect of the rising Emperor, and is anxious to make his way to head-quarters, is obliged for the present to remain in Shanghae. His annual report he makes to the missionaries in China, and to England, Germany, and the United States. Probably you will have a copy. But before you advance funds, I suppose you will like to know more about his religious views than you can gather from the report itself. The country may be open to us very soon, or it may not be for months or years. We must wait and see."

COPARTNERSHIPS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

"What is the nature of a copartnership?" is a question which appears in your editorial of March 9th, on the subject of "Sabbath-breaking Partnerships." Now I do not presume to be able to answer the question perfectly, but as I think we differ somewhat in in our opinions, I will give you my reasons for differing, as I think we do, on the subject.

You say, "There is no reason why two or more persons should enter into partnership, except the mutual services which they render each other." Now, admitting this to be a fact, though I much doubt it, does the nature of the copartnership lead to those sinful results of which you complain? You say that when a Sunday-keeper proposes a partnership with an observer of the Sabbath, this is the inducement which he holds out: "I will serve you, says he, on the Sabbath day, a very profitable day for business, thereby augmenting your gains much above what they would be if you were in business by yourself, and shut up the establishment on that day. The Sabbath-keeper agrees to the proposal, and by that very agreement says, I consent that you shall work for me on the Sabbath." Now I would ask if this is a fair representation of the case In the first place, we are not informed what was to be the compensation of the Sunday-keeper, but we must presume it was to be something in every particular fully equal, for no man of common sense would ever enter into a partnership on any other conditions than a perfect equality. This being the case, there is no service rendered, and no reward expected; each one works for himself, and not for the other. This conclusion will render the reply of the Sabbath-keeper very improper—"I consent that you shall work for me on the Sabbath day"—as he does not work for him, but for himself. In the second place, the assertion of the Sunday-keeper, that the Sabbath day is a very profitable one for business, as a general thing, is not correct. In villages, and some certain places, it may be so, but in manufacturing establishments, and with wholesale dealers, it is not the case.

I think the nature of a copartnership may be somewhat illustrated in this way: Two young men, brought up together at the same trade, wish to establish themselves in a business which requires two thousand dollars at least to commence with; but they have not the money to purchase, nor can they borrow it. At length they hear of a place that can be purchased for that amount, and they can each raise one thousand dollars; and as the place will accommodate both about as well as one, a partnership is formed, business commenced and continued; and at the end of the week or month, as the case may be, they receive an equal share of the income, without any extra charges for services, none having been performed and none expected. Each one has done his part, and no more, and I think no one has a right to complain. A difficulty may arise, not uncommon among mechanics; the young men, though brought up together, observe different days of the week as the Sabbath, one the seventh, the other the first. Now, suppose they wish to extend their business, and hire help; how shall it be managed to give no occasion for any one to complain of either of the partners for hiring or employing help on the Sabbath day? On this point people may differ, but my own opinion would be, that it would be proper and best for either of the partners to hire the first person they met with that would answer their purpose, without asking a question about the Sabbath, whether they kept the seventh or the first day of the week, or no day at all. But it would be expected, that if the seventh-day keeper employed a man, he would work with him on the first day of the week, and so of the Sunday-keeper, thus preserving the equality of their business. I can see no reason for complaint in such a case.

Again, two merchants own a vessel in partnerships. They both wish to send her to sea, but cannot be agreed on a voyage. At length one of them says, Well, if we cannot agree, she must lie in the harbor. No, says the other, she shall not lie in the harbor; she must go to sea; and if you wish to send her, you can pay me the customary charter, and send her where you please; if not, I shall take her on the same condition, and send her where I please; and you cannot help yourself. Such is the law of maritime copartnerships, and if there were three or four of the partners, it would be the same. If it were not so, two or three rich partners might take ruinous advantage of a poorer one, by compelling him to sell his share to them for half price.

I was once witness to a circumstance, in the early part of my life, which I think has a bearing on the "nature" of the case, and is not a supposition, but a reality. Two men owned a gristmill in partnerships; one kept the seventh day as Sabbath, the other the first, so that neither had any concern in the mill on his Sabbath. Thus for years the business moved on peaceably and satisfactorily, neither of the partners supposing himself guilty of any evil. At length one of those busy-bodies, who are ever inquisitive in other people's business, discovered, I believe for the first time, that the partners were guilty of transgressing God's law by keeping their mill running seven days instead of six; or, that the mill did not rest. From this small beginning quite a fire was kindled, until the matter was finally brought before the church, and the accused appeared to answer to the charge, and declared himself innocent of any crime, as he had neither labored in the mill himself, nor employed any other person to do so, on the Sabbath; and that he had received nothing from the income of the mill that belonged to any other person. The complainant replied, that the mill had been run on the Sabbath, which they had no right to do. The accused responded, that the mill was neither a man-servant, nor a maid-servant, nor an ox, nor an ass, that required rest, and that the fourth commandment required no other duty but rest, consequently he had no objection to his neighbor using his cart, his plough, or his harrow, on the Sabbath, provided he took them away before the day commenced; and, furthermore, that if he could so construct a mill or machine that it would run from Sixth-day evening to First-day morning without any attendance from any one, and do good business, he should have no hesitation in doing it, with a conscience void of offense to God or man. Here the defense rested, and the church, after mature consideration, dismissed the complaint; and I have no doubt that the decision would have been confirmed by the highest tribunals known to man.

I have another case in mind, though not with a direct bearing on the nature of a copartnership, but only the result. Two men among my nearest neighbors (when I was a half-grown boy,) owned a boat and seine in partnership, used for catching fish. As in the other case, one kept the seventh day and the other the first. When they went in the boat together, they made an equal division of the fish, if they caught any; but when one did not go, he drew a certain part of the fish for his share. It happened once, that the first-day keeper took the boat and went fishing on the seventh day, and, as it happened, caught a fine school of fish; and in the evening, after the Sabbath was over and past, he took the share of his Sabbatarian partner, dressed and cleaned them nicely, and carried them home to him, thinking to give him no trouble; but he would not receive them, because they were caught on the Sabbath day. "But what difference can it make to you, as you have had no trouble with it, and knew nothing about it, till you saw the fish come home to you?" "True," says he, "but I cannot think it would be right for me to eat them; but you may keep them and give me as many more, caught on some other day of the week, if you should have them." "No," says the other, "I hardly think I shall take the trouble to bring you any more, if you refuse these which I have taken so much pains to bring you." "You can do as you please," was the reply, "but I cannot think it is right for me to eat them." So the man shouldered the fish and departed, no doubt much pleased with his partner's decision.

Would it not be better to pursue the same course in the present case? People will differ about the meaning of words, and the requirements of the law. Then mark those who walk disorderly and sinfully, and bring them before the church, the only tribunal to settle difficulties among brethren of the same church, where they may safely risk their character, if not their interests, and thus end the controversy about "Denominational Sins," and "Sabbath-breaking Partnerships." MONUMENT TO ELD. COCHRAN.

The Seventh-day Baptist Church in Plainfield, N. J., have resolved to erect a suitable Tombstone or Monument at the grave of their late Pastor, Eld. J. H. Cochran. Having learned that others have expressed a wish to aid in the thing, they now offer to any of his friends, or the churches he has served, the opportunity to contribute as they may wish. The style and price of the stone or monument will be according to the free generosity of those contributing. All persons interested in the plan will please address the Committee at their earliest convenience.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 3.

In the SENATE, remonstrances from Indiana and Massachusetts against the introduction of Slavery into any territory from which it is excluded by the Missouri Compromise, were presented. Mr. Cass presented another petition that freedom be secured to American citizens in foreign countries, and gave notice that he would, three weeks hence, speak on the subject.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Committee on Post-Offices reported a bill, which was passed, regulating the pay of Deputy-Postmasters. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to transmit to the House copies of the correspondence, not now communicated, of the United States Legation at Constantinople and the United States Consulate at Smyrna with Capt. Ingraham and with the Government of Austria and with this Government, together with the instructions from this Government touching the seizure and rescue of Martin Kostza, and the terms and conditions on which he was liberated. A resolution was adopted, calling on the President for copies of the correspondence relative to the refusal of the authorities of Cuba in 1852 to permit the United States steamer Crescent City to land the mail and passengers. Mr. Campbell of Ohio asked leave to introduce a resolution requesting the President to cause negotiations to be opened with the Government of Great Britain, with the view of ascertaining upon what conditions that Government will consent to the annexation of the Canadas to the United States of America; the House refused to suspend the rules. Mr. Florence of Pa. asked leave to offer a resolution requesting the President to promote Capt. Ingraham to the rank of Captain in the Navy, and that the Secretary of the Navy appoint him to the command of one of the six steam frigates authorized to be constructed by the bill recently passed. Pending the consideration of the resolution, the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 4.

In the SENATE, a large number of remonstrances against the Nebraska bill were presented. After the presentation of a few petitions, the Senate went into executive session. The doors were temporarily opened to receive a message from the House announcing the passage of the Six Steam Frigates bill. The Senate immediately took it up and passed it. The bill from the House relating to the pay of Deputy-Postmasters was passed.

In the HOUSE, the bill to reduce and graduate the price of public lands was further postponed. The Committee on Public Lands reported back the bill to equalize grants of lands to the several States for certain public purposes. Without coming to any action on the subject, the House went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill. Mr. Clingman of North Carolina, and Mr. Wright of Pennsylvania, addressed the Committee in favor of the Nebraska bill as passed by the Senate. Mr. Matteson of New York followed in an able speech in opposition to the bill.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 5.

In the SENATE, a bill supplementary to the act confirming private land claims in Missouri, was reported, and the same was taken up and passed. A bill was introduced to authorize the recovery of assets of bankrupts when the same have been concealed, or not specified in the schedule filed by them—referred to Committee on Finance. The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and at 3¼ o'clock adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported back to the House the bill introduced by Mr. Churchwell, providing for the transportation of a mail between New Orleans and San Francisco. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to furnish copies of the correspondence between the United States Charge d'Affaires at Vienna and the State Department relative to the arrest of the Rev. Mr. Richmond; and also the correspondence relative to the rejection of the American Chargé to Trieste. The House then resumed the consideration of the General Appropriation bill. Four speeches were made upon the Nebraska bill. Messrs. Chandler of Pennsylvania, Nichols of Ohio, and Washburn of Illinois, spoke in opposition to the bill, and Mr. Smith of Tennessee, in favor of it.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 6.

In the SENATE, a large number of memorials relating to various subjects were presented. The bill granting a pension to the widow of Brig. Gen. Leavenworth was taken up and passed. The bill extending the Collection District of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, was also passed. A communication was received from the State Department covering certain correspondence relative to the imprisonment of Martin Kozsta.

In the HOUSE, a communication was received from the President, transmitting a mass of documents concerning the late seizure and detention of the steamship Black Warrior by the authorities at Havana, which were appropriately referred. The Deficiency bill, as amended by the Senate, was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. The consideration of the General Appropriation bill was then resumed. Mr. Preston of Kentucky having the floor, spoke in favor of the Nebraska bill, but was for striking out Mr. Clayton's amendment. Mr. Gerritt Smith of New York followed, and made a powerful speech against the bill.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 7.

In the SENATE, no business of public interest was transacted, the day being devoted to the consideration of bills on the private calendar. After the passage of thirty-six Senate and twelve House bills, the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill relating to the felonious burning of the steamboat Martha Washington on the Lower Mississippi, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole. A message was received from the President, stating that he had signed the bill authorizing the construction of six first-class steam frigates. The House then went into Committee on the General Appropriation bill. Mr. Caruthers of Missouri having the floor, addressed the Committee in favor of the Nebraska bill; Mr. Washburn of Maine followed, and spoke in opposition to the bill. The Committee then rose, and the House adjourned till Second-day.

European News.

By the arrival at New York of the steamer Europa, we are put in possession of European dates to March 25th.

From the seat of war in the East there is nothing new. There is evidently a continued inclination on the part of the Russians to remain upon the defensive, and a continued want of activity on the part of the Turks. Two steamers, one British and one French, have been sent to destroy certain obstructions to navigation placed by the Russians at the mouth of the Danube. This may very likely be the beginning of hostilities on the part of the allies against Russia. The fleet under Sir Charles Napier had arrived all safe at Wingo Bay, and long ere this has assembled at Kiel, prior to moving north to the scene of its future operations. It is supposed it will first occupy the isle of Aland before proceeding to bombard Cronstadt.

Advices from Constantinople state that the tripartite treaty between the Porte and England and France was signed on the 12th ult.

According to advices from St. Petersburg, the Russian Government proposes publishing various documents on the Eastern question. Among the documents destined for publication are some letters written by Prince Albert.

As to the Greek insurrection, we cannot get correct information. Letters from Athens state that it is spreading, and that bands of Greeks are incessantly crossing the frontiers from the Kingdom; but according to news from Corfu it is already suppressed.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California was received in New York on the 9th inst.

The country is reported to have been healthy, but the rainy season had been unusually severe.

Messrs. Wells, Fargo & Co. had forwarded from Sacramento, for shipment to the Atlantic States, nine hundred pounds of gold dust.

The accounts from Walker's Fillibuster Expedition were extremely discouraging. They were quartered at San Vincent, and the force was daily dwindling away. Several more had returned to San Francisco.

Col. Fremont had been overtaken in the mountains, going the central route to San Francisco. Several of his party had died of cold and hunger.

The intelligence from the mines is highly favorable. The late abundant rains have enabled the miners to resume their labors, and with encouraging results.

The steamers leaving San Francisco on 16th March had over $2,000,000 in treasure.

There will probably be 20 per cent. more land in cultivation in the State this year than there was last. The crop of wheat will be much larger—almost double; that of barley much less, and that of potatoes much less. A very large number of fruit trees and grape vines are being set out.

The Indians have caused the usual amount of trouble, and perhaps a few more than the usual number have been killed by the whites. About the end of last month four were killed and others seriously wounded in Yolo County, and about the same time nine were killed and five wounded on Clover Creek, at the head of the Sacramento. The standing offense is stealing cattle. At Cottonwood more trouble is anticipated. The red men are said to be supplied with about fifty United States yagers and plenty of amunition, and have about thirty American horses. They had made a widely concerted plan to attack the whites about the end of March. On McCloud River some thefts and other offenses were punished by a foray of 40 miners, who killed 22 Indians.

Rum-Selling in Illinois.

On the morning of the 28th ult., Thornton Alexander was killed by Rum at the place of his residence, Winchester, Indiana, leaving a widow and five young children, in abject poverty and heart-rending agony. He was a man of more than ordinary ability, of generous impulses and flattering prospects in life, until the web of the destroyer was woven about his heart. A little before he breathed his last, he said to the weeping circle around his bedside, "I am dying; whisky has done it. May those who have sold me the poison, die as painful a death as mine." So he died, leaving his destitute family in anguish unutterable.

At 4 o'clock that same afternoon, a procession of forty or fifty of the nobler Women of Winchester, with the agonized widow at their head, appeared in the streets of that town. They proceeded in marching order to the rum grocery of David Aker, handed him a pledge that he would sell no more liquor there, and demanded his signature. He demurred; but they were resolute, and at length he put down his name, opened his doors, and told them to take out his remaining stock of liquor and destroy it. Four barrels of Whisky and six or eight kegs of what are called Brandy, Gin, Wine, &c., (all drugged, adulterated Whisky, of course,) were then rolled out and emptied into the street. The estimated value of the liquor ($110) was then made up to him by subscription, and the Temperance pioneers moved on.

The next halt was at Wm. Page's (another groggery) where they met with a stouter resistance. Page refused to sign, and shut his door in their faces. They chopped it down, knocked in his window, rolled the barrels into the street and poured out the liquor. They then marched to James Ennis's, who signed the pledge; thence to Edward Retter's, who did likewise; thence to Way & Kizer's, who also signed; thence to H. P. Kizer's drug-store, where they met with equal success; then to Binager's, who utterly refused to stop selling. His daughter, however, who was one of the most active of the pioneers, pushed into the house, brought out a keg of liquor, and stove in the head. The procession next visited Wilson's grocery; he took the pledge; thence Craig's drug-store, with equal success; and then adjourned to meet at half-past two next day, to destroy the brewery—the only place in town where they had not established the principle of Prohibition. Binager gave in his adhesion during the evening, leaving Page 'alone in his glory' as a would-be rum-seller if he only had any to sell.

A post mortem examination of Alexander's body was made by the doctors that evening. They reported him "murdered by whisky"—the coats of his stomach having been entirely eaten up by it. Mrs. Alexander thereupon instituted proceedings against Page and Binager, for causing the death of her husband. So the case stood at the date of our last advices. [N. Y. Tribune.

MILWAUKEE AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.—The following extracts from a letter of Edward H. Brodhead, Engineer and Superintendent of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad, will be interesting and gratifying to our Wisconsin readers:—

I send you the following statement of the business of the M. and M. road for the three first months of the present year, and also the amount of the same three months in last year:

	1854.		1853.
January	$23,224 29	January	$10,801 25
February	26,192 38	February	8,930 86
March	20,698 61	March	8,143 35
Total	$70,115 23	Total	$27,875 46

The above exhibits an increase of over 150 per cent., and that too, when only eighteen miles have been added to the length of the Road.

I have thought if proper to say, that the Road will be in operation to Madison about the first of June, and that the gross receipts for the year 1854 are estimated at $400,000; and allowing 40 per cent. of the same for the expenses of operating the Road, leaves on account of dividends, on a capital of about $2,000,000, $240,000, equal to 12 per cent.

It is hardly necessary to add, that, if this result is attained, (of which I have not the least doubt, if the crops are a fair average,) on a Road, of which 80 miles is in operation for half the year, and 96 for the remaining half, for the first year's business, that it should be in the highest degree satisfactory. Besides that, it should settle beyond a doubt that the stock of the M. and M. Road will be a 10 per stock under all circumstances and at all times.

HEART-RENDING TRAGEDY.—A correspondent of The Cleveland Plaindealer, writing from Wanpacca County, Wisconsin, tells the following tragical tale:—

"A farmer sold a yoke of oxen to an individual in the neighborhood, and received his pay in paper money. The man who purchased the oxen, being in a hurry to start off, requested the farmer to assist in yoking them up. He accordingly went to the yard with the man for that purpose, leaving the money lying on the table. On his return to the house, he found his little child had taken the money from the table, and was in the act of kindling the fire in the stove with it. From the impulse of the moment, he hit the child a slap on the side of the head, so hard as to knock it over, and in the fall it struck its head against the stove with such force as to break its skull.

"The mother, who was in the act of washing a small child in a tub of water, in an adjoining room, on hearing the fracas, dropped the child and ran to the room whence the noise proceeded, and was so much terrified at what she there beheld, that she forgot the little child in the tub for a time, and upon her return to the room found the little one drowned! The husband, after a few moments reviewing the scene before him, seeing two of his own children dead, without further reflection, took down his gun and blew his own brains out!"

ATTEMPT TO MURDER.—A paper published at Vernon, Oneida Co, N. Y., says that Mr. Paul Guiger, a worthy citizen of that town, while on his way from Syracuse to Manlius, in Onondaga County, observed a man coming out of the woods which skirted the road at a little distance behind him, swinging carelessly a pocket handkerchief, which seemed to contain some weight in the end. As Mr. G. had some money with him, (he having received some $400 from the Bank of Vernon a day or two before,) he was suspicious of the fellow's movements. He therefore took his knife out of his pocket, and finding it in order, kept it in his hand. The fellow walked quite fast, still swinging his handkerchief, and as he gained upon him, Mr. G. stepped aside and let him pass. Immediately after the fellow slackened his pace, so much so that, with very slow walking, Mr. G. found he was gaining upon him. He therefore was in the act of passing him again, when the fellow, with a sudden jerk of the handkerchief, struck at Mr. G., hitting him up on the back side of the neck, evidently aiming at his head. Mr. G., immediately upon feeling the blow, fetched his hand containing the knife around suddenly, and struck the fellow on the back of the neck, inflicting a frightful wound, killing him instantly. Mr. G. hurried on to the next house, informing the inhabitants of what he had done, and giving himself up to the authorities. They found upon the person of the fellow two revolvers, and a slung-shot in the handkerchief. A coroner's inquest was held, and the circumstances corroborating the statement of Mr. G., he was honorably acquitted.

FRANCE AND HAYTI.—A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Thursday, April 6, 1854, says: The captain of the bark Charles E. Lee, arrived here to-day from Port-au-Prince, Hayti, states that on the 5th March a French frigate (brig) and a steamer anchored off the harbor, and the Admiral, Duquesne, demanded an audience of the Emperor, which was refused. A letter was then delivered, threatening that if certain demands were not complied with in 48 hours, the French would resort to the most severe measures. The Haytien Minister of War had a conference with the foreign Consuls, who were told that if the French Admiral resorted to the measures threatened in the letter, he would not be responsible for the consequences; the demands were too exorbitant. The Emperor gave his final answer on the night of the 9th, that rather than submit, the Haytien Government would cease to exist. The declaration had a good effect, for the next morning the French frigate hoisted the Haytien flag and saluted it. During the critical period, the Emperor acted with prudence and determination, and visited the forts and fleet, which were put in order for action.

THE WEST FIFTY YEARS AGO.—A correspondent of the Brantford (C. W.) Herald, in speaking of the progress of the age, and the benefits of railroads, says:—

"In the year 1807 it was advertised in Detroit that a vessel would leave that port for Buffalo. Spring opened and navigation was resumed. But lo! in this solitary craft there was but one passenger—and on reaching Buffalo there were but two shanty taverns. He asked for a stage to go on to Canandaigua. He was told there was but one stage a week, and that was just gone. This was a common wagon. What mighty changes has time effected by the instrumentality of inventive genius in modes of travel."

LETTER FROM A MEMBER OF THE REBEL ARMY AT NANKING.—"Two or three months ago," writes Dr. Legge, on the 26th November, 1853, "a shoemaker here (Hong-Kong) showed me a letter from a relative, who is in the ranks of the rebel army at Nanking. It was obviously the production of an unlettered man, but an enthusiast. 'I have joined,' writes he, 'this army, because God has raised up our true Lord to drive out the Tartars, and deliver China from idolatry. Our army is a holy army, and we are sure of success. Every morning, and every evening, and at our meals, we pray to God. Formerly I was an idolater, and worthy of death, as you are now. Worship God; go to some of the foreigners at Canton, and get a copy of God's Holy Book. That will teach you what to believe, and what to do.' Surely," observes Dr. Legge, "a movement in which such letters are going about through all China, must be regarded by us with intense solicitude."

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD.—Ran away last evening, about 4 o'clock, Sarah Marshall, a light mulatto girl about 20 years of age, with blue eyes and black hair, and might pass for white if not closely inspected. She is of medium size and well-dressed, wearing some jewelry. Captains of ships, steamboats, &c., are cautioned against harboring her. The above reward will be paid to any person returning her to No. 133 Barofine-st., or lodging her in any of the city jails.

THOS. J. FRISBY.

SUMMARY.

The Trustees of The People's College held a business meeting at Albany on Wednesday, April 5th. In the evening a public meeting was held at the City Hall, which was addressed by H. Greeley in exposition of the characteristics of the proposed College; by J. B. Miller of Oneida Co., in a methodical statement of the motive and process of a true Education according to the laws of Nature and Science; and by Gurdon Evans of Madison Co. in farther explanation of the true principles of Educational Reform, showing that the want of our age is a system reformed and expounded to correspond with the recent and rapid expansion of the sphere of human knowledge—a system which shall render the worker in wood, in iron, or whatever other material, thoroughly acquainted with its nature and properties, and so qualified to use it to the best advantage.

The Rochester Democrat says: A man lives in this city who has resided here forty years, without ever once riding upon a railroad car, or steamboat, although he is a business man and merchant. He has never in his life smoked or chewed tobacco, drank any spirituous liquor, or been sick a day. There are some other remarkable facts in this person's history, which we omit until another occasion—satisfied that what we have said will tax ordinary credulity to the full extent.

A memorial has passed the Wisconsin Legislature, asking Congress for the passage of the Homestead Bill; also for the passage of a bill making a general grant of land to the State for Railroads—the State to have full control over the distribution and regulation of the whole matter. To this memorial a proviso was added, by a vote of 70 to 2, in the House, "that the lands granted shall be kept constantly in market, and open to actual settlers, at $1 25 per acre, no person to be allowed to enter more than 160 acres of said lands."

During the year 1853, sixty monuments were erected in Mount Auburn. The number of interments for the year reached to five hundred and seventy-eight. Since the opening of the cemetery, six thousand one hundred and fifty-eight interments have been made. One hundred and twenty lots were inclosed with iron fences and hedges last year. The sum received for the sale of lots in 1853 was $25,569 63.

The deepest hole for mining purposes yet dug in California is in Trinity County. It is 700 feet deep, and the bed-rock has not been reached. Gold has been found all the way down, even in the boulders, which had to be cut through in the course. The work was commenced in 1841, and has been aided by subscriptions and other aid from the miners of the vicinity.

A valuable horse, belonging to Eleazer C. Woodward, in Bethany, Genesee Co., was cut to pieces by a scythe on the night of the 29th ult. Circumstances tending to show that the act was committed by a man named Fosdick, he was arrested and held to bail, whereupon he committed suicide by hanging himself to the limb of a tree.

The Evening Post contains a letter from Boston, which states that Mr. Edward Everett, during his late visit to that city, claimed, in a note addressed to Mr. Fletcher Webster, the authorship of the Hulsemann Letter. Mr. Everett, it is said, wrote it at Mr. Webster's request, who was indisposed at the time.

A great many bills on different banks are in circulation, altered from ones to fives, and also from ones to tens. The alterations are very ingeniously done, and unless the figures and the words "ten dollars" are very carefully scrutinized, they will deceive even those who are considered pretty good judges.

The New York Horticultural Society's exhibition will be open at Barnum's Museum, on Monday, May 1, and will close on Saturday, the 6th. The prizes will consist of silver cups, silver and bronze medals, diplomas, and money, the value of the highest premium not exceeding twenty dollars.

The number of lives which were lost during the year past by accidents on Massachusetts railroads was sixty-four; of which fifteen were upon the Providence and Worcester, ten upon the Western, nine upon the Boston and Worcester, eight upon the Fitchburg, and seven upon the Old Colony.

The last census discloses the astonishing fact, that nearly seven millions, or about one fourth of the people of the United States have emigrated and are living in different States from those in which they were born.

A fugitive slave who had "footed it" all the way from Charleston, S. C., to New Bedford, was "expressed" thence to Boston by Col. Hatch on Monday, and then took the "underground" for Canada.

Mrs. Judith Town, of Marshall, Oneida County, died a few days since, aged 107 years! Her eldest daughter is living, aged 86.

A slave woman in New Orleans had by her own industry accumulated $550, which she placed in the hands of a free colored woman for safe-keeping. The free woman refused to give it up when called for, and was accordingly arrested for breach of trust, at the instigation of the master of the colored woman.

The Kalamazoo (Mich.) Telegraph says the Ladies are going to turn out and improve and adorn the Park in that beautiful village. The Board of Trustees of Kalamazoo have voted to apply all moneys received from licensed shows in the village, to the improvement of the Park.

There is a great demand for mechanics at Alton, Ill. The Alton Telegraph says: "It seems almost impossible to obtain them in sufficient numbers to do the work which is waiting to be done." Joureymen carpenters are receiving $2, and brick-layers and plasterers $2 50 per day.

A new counterfeit has made its appearance at Chicago. It is a five on the Exchange Bank of Lockport, struck on the old Unadilla plate, altered to fit this bank. The genuine bill has three female figures in the center, the counterfeit has but one.

According to the report made to the Assembly, the entire income of Trinity Church corporation, from ground-rents, pew-rents, and interest on loans, is $80,967, out of which $35,569 has to be paid for interest on indebtedness.

Gerrit Smith announces that Dr. Beaumont of Ohio has manumitted a family of slaves which he owned, and which lived in Washington. Mr. S. had the pleasure of presenting them with the deed of manumission.

The number of miles of Railway in Massachusetts is estimated at 1600. Cost of these roads, $55,348,652. Receipts for 1853, $7,994,033; expenses, $4,332,756. Net income, $3,661,277.

There were four hundred and thirty-five vessels at the port of New York last week, Tuesday, as follows: 27 steamers, 73 ships, 46 barks, 75 brigs, and 214 schooners.

The bill loaning the credit of Massachusetts to the amount of two millions, for the Hoosac Tunnel enterprise, has passed both branches of the legislature.

A terrific explosion took place in a still-house at Allentown, Pa., on the 3d inst., resulting in the death of three men employed in the establishment—two Irishmen and a German.

The Washington Monument Association offers a reward of $500 for the detection of the parties who destroyed the block of marble presented by the Pope of Rome.

The ship Frigate Bird, arrived from Manilla, reports having been fired into by a Chinese piratical junk off Pulo Toly, and being chased for ten hours, but escaped.

The village of Dansville, N. Y., was visited with fire on the 31st of March, which destroyed nearly half of its business places, and caused the loss of about $100,000.

Victor M. Rice, of Erie County, has been chosen Superintendent of Public Instruction in the State of New York.

The salary of the Governor of Massachusetts has been increased from $2500 to $3500.

MARRIED.

At Shiloh, N. J., March 10, by Eld. W. B. Gillett, Mr. WM. WEST, of Shiloh, to Miss MARIAH R. CORDERY, of Roadstown, N. J.

In Plainfield, N. Y., March 22, 1854, by Enos W. Peck, Esq., Mr. BENJAMIN L. LANPHERE to Mrs. ANGELINE MOSHIER, all of Plainfield.

DIED.

In Cussewago, Crawford Co., Pa., Feb. 3, 1854, Mrs. ELIZABETH LEWIS, wife of Mr. Eber Lewis, in the 67th year of her age. Mrs. Lewis was born in Ireland, of respectable family, and came to this country when in her seventeenth year. Some few years after, she became converted to God, and united with the Baptist church. She remained a member of that church about twenty years, and until the constitution of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hayfield, in 1829, when she became one of its members at its organization, (having long been convinced of the duty of keeping the Sabbath.) In that church she remained a worthy member until the formation of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Cussewago, within the past year, when she became connected with it. Mrs. Lewis possessed a good mind and strong faith, and was much given to hospitality. Their house has long been the minister's home, as many of our old missionaries to the West can testify. She had been much afflicted for some years past. Her last sickness, of some months duration, was a painful one. But she bore it with Christian patience, and died in strong hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. A. A. F. R.

In Cussewago, Crawford Co., Pa., Feb. 25, 1854, of consumption, OLIVE, daughter of Dr. Hiram Boyd, in the 22d year of her age. During a revival in this place seven years ago, the family embraced the Sabbath. Olive and her father and mother were baptized and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hayfield. Bitter indeed has been her affliction for some few years past. Yet she gave good evidence of being a child of God. During her last sickness, of some ten months duration, she manifested complete resignation to His will. She has doubtless gone where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." A. A. F. R.

At Shiloh, N. J., March 16, FIRMAN RANDOLPH, son of Matthew S. Randolph, of inflammation of the lungs, aged 10 years.

March 20, of scarlet fever, near Shiloh, N. J., LEONARD S., son of George B. Davis, aged 5 years.

In Fulton, Rock Co., Wis, March 22, 1854, WELCOME D., son of Arnold and Tacy Collins, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after an illness of twenty months.

In Plainfield, N. J., on Saturday, April 1st, of consumption, [illegible] HARRIOT, in the 52d year of his age.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order CHIMES of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs; until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Make your Mark.

In the quarry should you toil,
Make your mark;
Do you delve upon the soil?
Make your mark;
In whatever path you go,
In whatever place you stand,
Moving swift or moving slow,
With a firm and honest hand,
Make your mark.

Should opponents hedge your way,
Make your mark;
Work by night or work by day,
Make your mark;
Struggle manfully and well,
Let no obstacles oppose,
None right shielded ever fell
By the weapons of his foes—
Make your mark.

What though born a peasant's son,
Make your mark;
Good by poor men can be done—
Make your mark;
Peasants' garbs may warm the cold;
Peasants' words may calm a fear;
Better far than hoarding gold
Is the drying of a tear.
Make your mark.

Life is fleeting as a shade,
Make your mark;
Marks of some kind must be made,
Make your mark;
Make it while the arm is strong,
In the golden hours of youth;
Never, never make it wrong;
Make it with the stamp of truth—
Make your mark.

The Old Clothes Dodge.

The city journals teem with exposures of the manifold devices by which knaves prey upon and defraud the unwary; but we think the following, which came under our notice a few days ago, a "leetle" ahead of all precedent:—

The Old Clothes Dodge is confined exclusively to West-st., where, at almost any hour in the day. it may be seen in operation after this fashion: A dirty, green-looking fellow, wanders up and down the street, with a bundle of black wearing apparel, tied up in a cotton handkerchief, under his arm. His appearance would lead the superficial observer to suppose he had just landed from an emigrant ship, entirely ignorant of the ways and manners of the people he had so recently come among. He looks with an air of confiding ignorance into the face of every passer-by, until his eye catches one whom he deems suitable for his operations—usually some countryman. Assuming an air of earnest inquiry, he acaosts the gull with—

"Hey, boss, can you tell a stranger where the pawnbroker's shop is?"

Of course Verdant "don't know."

With a look of despair, Artful exclaims, "My God, what shall I do? My poor wife and children are starving; have n't had any victuals for two days. If I could only get to my brother in Ohio, we should be all right; but I have no money. What shall I do? I was just going to the pawnbrokers's with my best Sunday suit." [Here he exhibits his bundle, from which peers the very black and very shining suit.] "It cost me six pounds in the old country, just before I came away, but we've had a long passage, and I am forced to sell it to get food for my family."

This is said in the most lachrymose tone, and with a look of almost irresistible sincerity. Then, brightening up, he exclaims, hopefully—

"Perhaps, boss, you'd buy 'em?"

Verdant doesn't want 'em, but is touched with the pitiful story, and inquires the price. Artful is too prudent to name one, but leaves it to the other's generosity. After some hesitation and further coaxing he ventures to ask, "Would five dollars buy 'em?"

Artful (ignorant of the currency)—"How many suvrens is that?"

An explanation is given, and Artful intimates that the pawnbroker "would give more for them than that."

A chaffer takes place, and the highest offer of Verdant is eventually accepted; the money and clothes change hands, the cotton handkerchief being thrown in with the latter. Verdant is too bashful to closely examine his purchase in the street, and Artful, with many expressions of gratitude and invocations of blessings on his dupe, leaves to "provide for his starving family."

Soon he reappears with another bundle; the same scene is gone through; and thus he lives. The clothes are very old and threadbare, but steamed, renovated, and gummed to look like new cloth. At the first touch of rain the dye washes out, and the cloth, rotten from age and acid, drops to pieces.

Such is the "old clothes dodge." [Tribune.

Effect of Shoemaking.

"This is the effect of shoemaking," said a young mechanic to us the other day, shaking a well-filled purse in our face. It was not said boastingly, but with an honest pride. We wish to refer our readers to a few particulars in the history of this young man. He is the fourth son of an industrious mechanic, who has known the height of affluence and the depths of poverty. His eldest is reared for the ministry, and is, we believe, a talented and useful member of society. A second was a mechanic, a hard-working fellow. The third has acquired an excellent education, after much labor and hard work, through his own means. The youngest son, him to whom we introduce the reader, was brought up in the conviction that labor was derogatory to respectability—that wealth was the highest good that could be enjoyed by mortals. He was early sent to school, then to the academy, preparatory to a course of professional studies. Meanwhile, his old father was toiling and starving to attain the distinctions which are attendant upon wealth, merely for the sake of his children; but still willing to forego all the pleasures and emoluments of the world, if his sons could be useful and lauded in the community.

The young man entered upon his studies, convinced that he was the son of a rich man, comparatively, and consequently he was entitled to a "full swing" in all the frolics and sprees that come off. Books, and duty itself, were mere subservients to fun. So when his six months were completed, he came home to his disappointed parents a wild, reckless, indolent boy, instead of the sedate, fixed and ambitious young man. He loitered about home some time, but his father's constitution was broken, his sales low, and his returns nothing. Starvation was before the family. Many and fruitless were the applications which the young man made at the trading establishments in the city for occupation. There were more clerks than there were merchants, and more traders than buyers. Worn out with fatigue and the stings of conscience for his former misspent time, with his spirit humbled, and nerved to undergo any privation rather than return without employment to his father's house, the shop from every mechanic of the blacksmith's to the jeweller's was besieged; but it was a time of general depression in business—every man looked out for his own good. So, without blame, conscious that he had done his best to obtain an occupation, the young man went home. The well-spread table, the carpeted floor, and the refinement which was visible in the household, but seemed to aggravate the misery of its tenants.

One day the young man was in the shop of a shoemaker who had amassed by his industry a respectable fortune, while he had built up a reputation which can never die from the memory of the community in which he lived. "Why don't you go to work?" asked the old man. "I can't get anything to do," was the response. "Come and learn my trade," said the old man. It was a bargain. The pampered son of fortune became the apprentice of honest father —— His good habits endeared him sensibly to the generous shoemaker, and the progress which he made in his new avocation surprised every one who had been formerly acquainted with his idle habits. The old man died; during his illness he carried on the business of the shop, and received for his service some old tools which had been the property of his employer. He commenced business for himself, but soon went to a flourishing village and entered a large establishment as a journeyman. His love for study and refinement increased. The best society was thrown open before him. The confidence of his employer was unbounded in his integrity, his shop-mates were pleased with his native talent and his address—he became the sun of their little circle; and when he left his employer, in the hope of obtaining a more lucrative situation, his loss was severely lamented. We were recently conversing with this young gentleman upon the false pride which had ruined so many boys. Said he: "If I had obtained a clerkship when I sought it, I should have been an outcast in society, and a beggar. This is the effect of shoemaking, of industry, and enterprise—a good reputation, a clear conscience, and a happy life."

A Raft of Monkies.

A singular and most touching drama was lately observed by the crew of a French sloop-of-war, recently returned from the seas of India. A dozen monkeys had been put on board and tied on deck, where they had delighted the old tars from morning till night with their frolics and gambols. Some, however, discontented with the short space allotted to them, broke their chains, invaded the captain's cabin, jumped over chairs and tables, spilt the ink on official documents, and behaved in such an inconsiderate manner that their death was resolved upon and the warrant signed on the spot. The order to throw these poor innocent victims overboard was received with general sadness on the forward deck. The old sailors, after a long consultation, came to the conclusion that a raft might be built, upon which the poor creatures might at least find one chance of salvation. All hands were soon at work and the raft completed, a small mast made fast to it, a sail hoisted to the direction of the current; a good supply of biscuits and crackers, and a cask of water, were put on board, and the twelve unfortunate outlaws were abandoned to their unhappy fate. We have been told, and willingly believe, that the old sailors were moved even to tears, and, waving their hats, remained on deck, watching with anxious solicitude the frail embarkation until it was out of sight and disappeared toward the land, where they hoped it might go on shore on some neighboring coast. Tomato Culture.

Very few gardeners understand the proper mode of cultivating this delicious and wholesome vegetable. Let the seed be sown in a box in the middle of winter—let the plants grow in your bed-room, for it is wholesome—they will suck in the carbonic acid which is generated by the stove and your breathing, while they will drive off oxygen, the life-giving principle for man and all animals. Remove them in the spring, when danger from frost is over, and set them at a regular distance of four feet apart. When they are two feet high, put stakes to them, fresh cut young shoots from the woods, with boughs on which you can train the branching vines of the tomato. Trim the lower branches, and keep the vines from the grounds, either by trellis-work or by strings interlinking, or by placing the branches on the boughs of the shoots. After the plants have been in the ground about three weeks, hoe up the ground around, destroy every weed and manure the roots. By this means you will secure a supply of rich tomatoes constantly.

Indian Narcotics.

Bayard Taylor recently delivered an interesting lecture in New York on the Arabians, in the course of which he had occasion to mention the habit of using a certain narcotic drug, which prevails among this people, and described its effects in some experiments he had made upon himself. His description was as follows:—

While in Arabia, I had one very remarkable experience. There is a drug in the East, whose effect is like opium, which is prepared from the Indian hemp. It was much used by the Saracen warriors, when about to enter a battle, as a stimulus. It produces on the imagination a double consciousness; one part of the mind seems to study while the other part looks on. From motives of curiosity, I was persuaded to try the effects of it on my own system. I was in Damascus at the time. Soon after taking the drug, the effects began to appear. I saw the furniture in the room, talked with the company, and yet I seemed to be near the pyramid of Cheops, whose blocks of stone appeared to me like huge squares of Virginia tobacco. The scene changed, and I was on the desert in a boat made of the mother of pearl. The sand seemed to be grains of lustrous gold, through which my boat ran as easily as on the waves of the sea; the air seemed filled with harmonies of the sweetest music; the atmosphere was filled with light, with odors and music. Before me there seemed to be a constant series of arcades and rainbows, through which for fifteen years I seemed to glide. The finer senses were developed, and all gratification was single harmonious sensation. Hence we can easily conceive the origin of the Arabian Nights. My companion, a huge Kentuckian, tried the drug with an amusing effect. After looking at me awhile, he suddenly started up with the exclamation, "I'm a locomotive," and began to cut off his words like the puff of an engine, and to work his arms like the moving of the wheels. At last he seized the jug for a drink, but set it down with a yell, "How can I take water into my boiler, when I'm letting off steam?"

Wintering Stock.

Much of the profits of rearing cattle depends upon the manner of keeping them through the winler. If they are suffered to lose flesh during the cold season, and turned out to pasture "spring poor," it takes a long time to regain what they have lost. With the best quality of early cut and well made English hay, with regular and judicious feeding, and comfortable quarters, a stock of cattle, from the oldest to the youngest, may be made to thrive all winter, to gain size and flesh; and with a small allowance of meal, potatoes, turnips, or other roots, they would do still better.

Our horses, cattle and sheep were originally constituted to subsist the year round on green and succulent food.

By domestication, they have been gradually introduced from a warm to the cold climate of the north, where, as with us, they have to be fed on dry forage for six months or more, every year. This, in some degree, is placing them in an unnatural condition, and it seems to us, it is a strong argument in favor of a more extensive root culture among us, for feeding purposes.

Most farmers have more or less coarse fodder, such as poor hay, corn-fodder, straw, &c. And many commence feeding their cattle exclusively on these the first part of the winter, or till it is used up, and seem to think it is a "good riddance of bad rubbish." Cattle and sheep, doubtless, like a change of food as well as man, and when kept in good condition, they seem to relish a foddering of meadow hay, corn-fodder. or straw, occasionally; but if fed entirely on such fodder the first half of the winter, they lose flesh, and will be apt to come out in the spring in poor condition, in spite of English hay.

Corn-fodder is as nutritious as common stock hay, when fed in connection with it, but to compel cattle to live on such fare for weeks together, is, as some one has said, "absolutely cruel, as it makes their teeth sore when fed for a length of time." A better way is, to give cattle one foddering a day of corn butts, and that at the last feeding at night, and if they have a pretty stout allowance given them, they will eat it nearly clean before morning—at least, what they reject will hardly pay for passing through the straw-cutter. Cattle, to do well, must have drink as well as food; and a free use of card and brush add to their good looks. [Granite Farmer.

Electric Weaving Machine.

The Commerce Sericole, a French paper, gives an account of a remarkable invention by which it is proposed to utilize the electric current in the process of weaving. It remarks, that the Jaquard loom, although an admirable invention, is not without certain difficulties and defects. Thus, for each passage of the shuttle there must be a piece of cardboard of certain breadth, pierced with holes arranged so as to correspond with the design; and when we bear in mind that for certain as many as 40,000 of these pieces of cardboard have to be used, and that 1,500 are required in ordinary cases for a design of the simplest coloring, and calculating that they cost about 15 francs, ($2 80) per hundred, it will easily be seen that these cards must be the cause of great expense as well as inconvenience. There are other objections, also, of more or less importance.

In the electric machine, the treadle of the weaver lifts the threads, and conducts the extremity of each, by means of copper wire, with a current of electricity, either positive or negative, at will, and the result is, that without noise, some of the threads remain suspended and others descend, according as the current is directed. To direct the electricity, a series of points is arranged in a line, like the teeth of a comb; each point communicating with an electro-magnet. The weaver will only have to pass underneath these points the design traced in varnish on a cylinder, or on a metallic leaf, with the battery. The current will pass only where the varnish is wanting; and it will be the corresponding threads only which will remain suspended, and which by that means will reproduce the design as it came from the hands of the artist. It is estimated that this new mode will ensure a saving in the most complicated designs of nearly three-fourths of the expense, and in others of at least one-half.

Corn Cobs.—If farmers and planters would shell all the corn they sell, and reserve the cobs and have them ground into meal, they would find a great resource in them for the feeding of their cattle. Cob-meal, we think, may be set down at about one-third as nutritious as meal made from the grains of corn. If cob-meal be cooked in the way recommended for stalks, and mixed with cut straw, it will make strong, nutritious food. Then why should the corn-grower sell his corn on the cob? Why should he pay freight on the cobs for which he gets nothing, when he could use them to such an advantage in the feeding of his cattle? These are questions worthy of consideration, and we trust they will be so considered. Half a peck of cob-meal and half a bushel of hay or fodder, fed out three times a day to a cow in milk, will make her give a good mess of milk, and keep her in a good condition, provided she has good accommodations to protect her from the weather. Sheds or stables are indispensable to the keeping of cattle. The saving in food during a single winter and spring would more than pay for the building of two sheds.

A Valuable Table.—The following table will be found very valuable to many of our readers:

A box 24 inches by 16 inches square, and 28 inches deep, will contain a barrel.

A box 14 inches by 16 inches square, and 14 inches deep, will contain half a barrel.

A box 26 inches by 15-2 inches square, and 8 inches deep, will contain one bushel.

A box 12 inches by 11-2 inches square, and 8 inches deep, will contain half a bushel.

A box 8 inches by 8 4 inches square, and 8 inches deep, will contain one peck.

A box 8 inches by 8 inches square, and 4-2 inches deep, will contain one gallon.

A box 7 inches by 8 inches square, and 4-8 inches deep, will contain a half gallon.

A box 4 inches by 4 inches square, and 4-1 inches deep, will contain one quart.

Rural Districts and Cottages of England.—Dr. Choules, in his journal of the Vanderbilt party, after a ride from Bristol to Cheltenham, says:—

"The county of Gloucestershire is renowned for its scenery, and nowhere can the traveler find so much manufacturing interest united with more perfect rural beauty than he meets with in the rail car between Bristol and Gloucester. The factory and its operatives are planted on the edges of hills, under the wings of woods, amid honeysuckles, laburnums, gilliflowers, and jessamines; all around are running brooks, and singing-birds, and busy bees. And what roads and lanes of beauty! And then the exquisite mingling up of gorse, and bloom, and heath, and fern! Talk of cottages! come and see the laboring-man's cottage on these hill-sides! There are flowers all round his door, ivy trailing to the gable-ridges, fruit-trees right and left, and one side of the house is pretty sure to have a pear tree trained all over it. No man understands the thousand beauties of Great Britain who does not wander through her inland counties, and tramp through the unnumbered old roads that lead to nowhere."

Boston Schools.—An abstract of the annual report of the School Committee, in the Puritan Recorder, states that the city of Boston appropriated $330,000 for the support of public schools the past year. It has invested in school houses $1,500,000. The average number of pupils is about 22,500. The yearly cost of educating each child, therefore, is about fifteen dollars. The Latin school for boys averages about two hundred pupils; the English High Schools about the same number. The latter is designed to give such an education in moral and intellectual philosophy, logic, chemistry, the higher branches of mathematics, and the French and Spanish languages, as will fit the pupil for commercial and mercantile pursuits, or to act as a master mechanic, or civil engineer. The Normal School, averaging one hundred and seventy-five pupils, is designed to raise up teachers for the Grammar and Primary Schools. The Grammar Schools are twenty in number, and contain about ten thousand pupils. The Primary Schools number one hundred and ninety-five, averaging fifty pupils each. The number of teachers is as follows: Masters, 31; Sub-masters, 11; Ushers, 17; Female Assistants, 150; total, 209.

Size of London.—London extends over an area of 78,029 acres, or 122 square miles, and the number of its inhabitants, rapidly increasing, was two millions three hundred and sixty-two thousands, two hundred and thirty-six, (2,362,236) on the day of the last census. A conception of this vast mass of people may be formed by the fact, that, if the metropolis was surrounded by a wall, having a north gate, a south gate, an east gate, and a west gate, and each of the four gates was of sufficient width to allow a column of persons to pass out freely four abreast, and a peremptory necessity required the immediate evacuation of the city, it could not be accomplished under four and twenty hours, by the expiration of which time the head of each of the four columns would have advanced a no less distance than seventy-five miles from their respective gates, all the people being in close file, four deep.

Profitable Farming.—A correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, writing a running sketch of his travels in Illinois, gives the following description of an Illinois farm:—

"The cars are now passing an immense corn-field, of fifteen hundred acres, within one inclosure. Think of that! It is owned by Mr. John Alexander, of Sangamon county, who has 3000 acres of prairie here, in one body, 1800 of which is in corn. His business is stock-feeding. To raise his crops and feed them out, he employs about thirty men and thirty heads of horses per year. His sales of stock, the past year, amounted to over $30,000. Eight years since, he had about $500 in his pocket, and bought some of this land. Now it is paid for, and he is worth his thousands. Here is a specimen of Illinois farming."

The End of a Statesman's Career.—A French paper states that Lord Brougham has placed the following inscription over the entrance door of his chateau at Cannes:—

Inveni portum; spes et fortuna, valete;
Sat me lusistis; ludite nunc alios.

That is, "I have reached my haven; hope and fortune, farewell; ye have sported with me enough; now find other dupes." Lord Brougham's French neighbors construe this as "an announcement of his intention to retire from public life, and to pass the remainder of his days among them in the genial climate of the Var." However that may be, the adoption of such a motto, at the end of the career of such a brilliant statesman, is a very instructive fact. He stands forth, like Solomon at the end of life, writing "vanity of vanities" on all.

First Use of Gas.—In the year 1792, Mr. Murdoch made use of gas in his house and office at Reduth, Cornwall, England, where he then resided. The mines at which he worked being distant some miles from his house, he was in the constant habit of filling a bladder with coal gas, in the neck of which he fixed a metallic tube, with a small orifice, through which the gas issued; this being ignited, served as a lantern to light his way for the considerable distance he had nightly to travel. This mode of illumination being generally unknown, it was thought by common people that magical art alone could produce such an effect, and the discoverer actually run some risk of personal inconvenience from the prejudice of his narrow-minded neighbors.

What Epidemics Cost.—During the sitting of the Government Commission, held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, to inquire into the causes of the fearful ravages of cholera in that town, Mr. J. B. Hume, the Chief Commissioner, from evidence that had been laid before him, made a calculation that the epidemic has cost the town £380 for medicine and burials alone, and would cost it £50 a week for eight years to support the widows and destitute—nearly £30,000. In addition to this sum, he said, some thousands of pounds had been collected and distributed by the vicar. There are also 200 benefit societies in the town, and taking the average loss at £500 each, made £10,000 more.

Fidelity, good humor, and complacency of temper, outlive all the charms of a fine face, and make the decays of it invisible.

VARIETY.

Professor Gluckmann's invention to establish communications between the brakemen of trains by means of electricity, has been lately tried with the express train from Euston square to Birmingham, and the results have been highly satisfactory. The apparatus consists of two batteries, each one secured within a box and placed at the opposite ends of the train, connected by a wire which passes under the cars and is joined to bells which can be set ringing whenever the attention of the brakemen or conductors is required. The great merit of this invention lies in its simplicity and rapidity of action.

The Royal Sledge of the Russian Czar, which has been put in requisition by the abundant snow in Europe, is drawn by two gray horses, across whose backs are thrown leopard-skins; in the net work over the harness are suspended small circular bells, mounted with feathers, besides larger bells, which produce three different notes. The body of the sledge is painted with a dark ground, cross-barred with gold, and the inside is lined with red-velvet.

Horatio King, Esq., who has been appointed Assistant Postmaster General, in the place of Mr. Hobbie, deceased, is a native of Maine, a scholar, and a good writer. He is a printer by trade, and was at one time the editor of The Jeffersonian, published in Portland. During the administration of Mr. Fillmore, he was placed in the bureau of the Post-Office Department which had to do with international postal concerns.

According to the computation of the accountant of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the sum now actually received on the Chinese Million-Testament Fund will suffice for not fewer than 928,858 copies. It appears that this prompt expression of special sympathy has been given without detriment to the more general interests of that great institution. The Jubilee Fund already amounts to the large sum of £54,206.

The Washington Star says the House Committee on Post-Offices has agreed to report a bill increasing the compensation of Postmasters ten per cent. on the commissions now received—the Postmaster General being given discretionary power for increasing compensation at distributing and separating offices.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

But our present inquiry is especially with regard to the continuance and universal observance of the weekly Sabbath in that blessed period. And in respect to it also, explicitly, does the prophet declare, that it shall then not only have place, but that even altogether apart from its more ordinary and local sanctification by the Gentiles in the several places of their birth and of their dwelling, "from one Sabbath to another" shall men regularly, from every land, come to worship before the Lord in the city of Israel's solemnities. This is to be no partial observance, nor is it even to be limited to those inhabiting the lands lying least remote, or to those otherwise placed in especially favorable circumstances. The prediction, on the contrary, is, that this recurring and delightful homage shall there be rendered to the Lord our Maker, "from one Sabbath to another," even by "all flesh." The Sabbath thus includes in its holy embrace of love and truth, the children of men of every clime. By all shall Jesus be then acknowledged the Creator, through their remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy, because that on it God rested from all His work.

And here it should scarcely be necessary again to remark, that the only weekly Sabbath any where spoken of in Scripture is the Seventh Day. Obviously, indeed, the New Moons and Sabbaths foretold by the prophet as to be henceforth observed to the glory of God, are the same New Moons and Sabbaths of which he had also intimated the rejection when perverted as they were by Israel, saying, "Your New Moons and Sabbaths I cannot away with." (Is. i. 13.) And the Sabbath, so named, as to be hereafter hallowed, is manifestly the same Sabbath which the priests, the sons of Zadok, who are to teach the people of Israel the difference between the holy and the profane, shall teach them to hallow." (Ezek. xliv. 24.) Nor is it to be questioned, that this is the identical day of which, as we have already seen, Isaiah elsewhere declares, "Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it, that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it;" and the same which he commends the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord for keeping; (Is. lvi. 2, 6;) and for which he promises blessing, also, to him who calls the Sabbath a delight, and turns away his foot from doing his own pleasure on God's holy day. (Is. lviii. 13.) And finally, it is the same Sabbath as that upon which, as contradistinguished from "the six working days," the eastern gate of the temple is to be opened for worship. (Ezek. xlvi. 1, 3, 12.)

It is therefore submitted as a truth proved, that the divine promises in reference to the times of refreshing and restitution, now approaching, are, that the seventh day of the week, God's holy day, shall be then universally observed. Thus the memorial of God's original work of creation and His resting from it—a memorial instituted before sin had produced upon man its baleful influence of estrangement from his God, yet mercifully continued subsequently, notwithstanding of his sad fall—this memorial is thus represented by the prophet as still to be maintained through and beyond the wreck of a present evil world, and as holding its place so long as that new earth which God hath sworn to create shall endure. In that most glorious day, when true obedience shall be given to all divinely approved ordinances—obedience such as never has been given since man's first transgression—the Sabbath of the Lord shall thus hold conspicuous and honorable place. The innocence and bliss of Eden's garden, as we have formerly seen, rendered not unnecessary nor unsuitable such a memorial of the great Creator, who had made all things very good; nor will the increased spirituality of those of the Millennial age render them incapable of deriving pleasure and profit from the sanctification of the Sabbath. If the Sabbath could be prized and be profitable to men in Paradise as a testimony for God, so also in Paradise restored will its value for the same end be duly esteemed. To all the nations of the earth, the fact even of a new creation, we thus learn, will not invalidate the primeval claim of the appointed memorial of the Creator's dignity in the earlier manifestation made of His power and wisdom and goodness. Yes, in that blessed time when the triumphs of the cross shall be fully reflected in the brightness of the Redeemer's crown, and when the work of redemption shall be everywhere accepted, there will still be seen a glory of its Lord in the original work of creation—each having its own appropriate and appointed symbol. Admired of all them that believe, the Son of Man in His glory, the Lord of hosts, seated on the throne of His father David, reigning in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously, while all the Kings of the earth shall confessedly hold their sovereign title from Him, reverently shall "all flesh," from one Sabbath to another, bear testimony of their faith in the power and godhead of Jesus as the Great Creator.

And, surely, if it be so, that in those days of acknowledged purity, the Sabbath shall be observed as before—that the very day sanctified and blessed of God ere sin entered into the world shall again be observed by all—that as much shall the power and wisdom and goodness of God be appreciated, and His authority be respected in men's remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy, as in obeying any other of the commands of the Decalogue—is it imaginable that a disregard of that day now is compatible with the love and reverence which we owe to the Father, or that such disregard is in any degree honoring to the Son? Can it be supposed, that in the day prophetically foreshown to be preëminent for the prevalence of righteousness in the earth, and in which all glory shall be ascribed to the Redeemer, when indeed Christ shall see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied, and when the value of His salvation and the importance of His resurrection shall be better known and prized than in the present day of the church's declared apostacy—that when God, by His prophets, makes such acknowledgment of the fidelity of that coming age, and so complains of our degeneracy—can it be supposed that the fact of the then universal observance of the only Scripturally appointed Sabbath reflects no light in this respect upon the present duty of the church? Shall any who truly know and love the Lord willingly and without shadow of authority continue to desecrate the only day that God has sanctified and blessed; preferring for it of their own accord another which God expressly includes among the six working days; and this without a fear, even, that they may be depriving themselves of a blessing which it is the purpose and desire of the Holy One, through His Sabbath, to continue to bestow? [To be continued.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES—NO. 1.

As the times in which we live seem fraught with very great and important events, and a crisis is at hand, [illegible] not amiss to look at the chart of changes in the[illegible] compare it with the prophetic [illegible] be: if we can learn our position, [illegible] world's position, in the great prophetic chart. The apostle Peter, when he testified to the transfiguration and glory of Christ, said, "We have also a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn." 2 Pet. 1: 19. I cannot pursue the whole scope of prophecy, but I wish to call attention to some portions of it in connection with the present time.

In Daniel and in Revelations we have given us several orders of events, all terminating alike, viz. in the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom. In the great image, Daniel (2d chapter) sees four universal kingdoms in their consecutive order, and the fifth is the kingdom of God. In chapter 7th the four kingdoms are represented by four beasts. When the first of the four universal kingdoms or monarchies (Babylon) had passed away, Daniel had another vision (8th chapter) of the three remaining universal monarchies, in the ram, the he-goat, and the little horn that "waxed exceeding great." These are great outlines, consecutive in their order, and filled up with a consecutive order of events, found principally in the 11th and 12th chapters of Daniel.

Passing over about 500 years B. C., we will commence with the 20th verse of chap. 11th. "Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes, the glory of the kingdom; but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle." Augustus Cæsar (formerly Octavius) was brought up and adopted by Julius Cæsar, to become his successor; hence, "in his estate." He was elected Augustus and Emperor B. C. 31. Previous to this, Mark Antony and Lepidus associated with him to avenge the death of Julius Cæsar. "A raiser of taxes (enrollment) the glory of the kingdom." "And it came to pass in those days, that there went forth a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed," (enrolled.) Luke 2: 1. Augustus means "the glory of the kingdom;" he died peaceably in bed, a few years after the commencement of the raising of taxes.

Verses 21, 22—"And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honor of the kingdom, but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries. And with the arms of a flood shall they be overflown from before him, and shall be broken; yea also the prince of the covenant." Tiberius, although adopted by Augustus, fearing the envy of Caius, refused the honor, but succeeded to the empire without opposition (peaceably) after the death of Augustus, which honor he affected to decline, and thus by dissimulation professed to yield to the repeated solicitations of the servile Senate. "A vile person." Josephus says, "This Tiberius had brought a vast number of miseries on the best families of the Romans, since he was easily inflamed with passion in all cases, and his anger was irrevocable until he had executed it, although he had taken hatred against men without reason." Seneca says of him, "Tiberius was never intoxicated but once in his life, for he continued in a state of perpetual intoxication, from the time he first gave himself to drinking to the last moment of his life." His reign was one of tyranny and hypocrisy, and his life one of infamous debauchery and beastly intemperance. He became so exceedingly base and vile as to be held in utter contempt, and A. D. 26, disgraced in every degree of infamy, he retired or banished himself from Rome to the Isle of Caprae, in the bay of Naples, where he remained until March A. D. 37, if possible growing worse and worse. Attempting to return to Rome, he stopped at a country house near Misenum, where Macro the pretorian prefect caused him to be suffocated with pillows. The best families of Rome, and many too who flattered him to accept the crown, were overflown from before him and broken, or put to violent death. "Yea also the Prince of the Covenant," the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who was crucified under his reign.

Verses 23, 24—"And after the league made with him, he shall work deceitfully, for he shall come up and shall become strong with a small people. He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his father's fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey and spoil and riches." This league, contrary to the command of God when He brought them into the land of Canaan, (Deut. 7: 2, 16, 19; Judg. 2: 1—5; 1 Kings 3: 1—11,) Judas Maccabeus made with the Romans B. C. 161. This league was different from the treaties they had at various times made with other nations and tribes for temporary purposes, inasmuch as it was of a permanent character, and designed to protect them from all their enemies, under all circumstances. Bacchides, the Grecian general, had long been warring against the Jews, but upon the promulgation of this league, B. C. 159, he was made to desist, and return to his own land, and never after this did the Grecians return to Judea. (See 1 Mac. 8: 9, and Josephus B. 12.) It was obtained at the instigation of Judas Maccabeus, by Eupolenius the son of John, and by Jason the son of Eleazer, when Judas Maccabeus was high priest, and Simon his brother was commander of the army, B. C. 161, but was received, accepted, and went into effect, B. C. 158. 'The decree of the Senate (of Rome) concerning a league of assistance and friendship with the nation of the Jews: It shall not be lawful for any that are subject to the Romans to make war with the nation of the Jews, nor to assist those that do so, either by sending them corn or ships or money; and if any attack be made upon the Jews, the Romans shall assist them as far as they are able; and again, if any attack shall be made upon the Romans, the Jews shall assist them; and if the Jews have a mind to add to or take anything from this league of assistance, that shall be done with the common consent of the Romans; and whatsoever addition shall thus be made, it shall be of force.'

"He shall work deceitfully." How? "For he shall come up and become strong with a small people." Rome (the people) entered into possession of the fattest countries without war. Egypt, Bythinia, Cyrenia, and Lybia, were bequeathed to the Romans by will, which afterwards assumed the pretext for reducing them to Roman provinces. Many countries were particularly benefited, favored and rewarded, under the protection of the Romans, thus sharing the spoil, prey and riches, and being secured from all the inconveniences and misfortunes of war with their neighbors. By referring to this league, the angel leaves the chain of events which he was making known to Daniel, and goes back to the beginning of the Roman power, so as to bring in the connection of that power with Daniel's people, the Jews; and here also he gives the length of the imperial dynasty, 360 years. "And he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds even for a time." A time is a year, as Dan. 7: 25—360 prophetic days, a day for a year. The empire of Rome remained united as one during this time, and kept all the "strong holds" of the earth in subjection; but this state of things should not continue forever—a change must come at the time appointed.

J. C.

DIVISION AMONG THE JEWS.

A few weeks since, the Board of Deputies held its annual meeting. This Board is an institution of about one hundred and fifty years standing. It possesses no religious functions or authority, but is concerned solely for the liberties and secular rights of the Jewish community. Its members are delegated, in stated proportions, by all the synagogues of the United Kingdom. Some ten years ago, in London, a small body of Jews separated from their co religionists, on the ground that the traditions of the fathers are not binding, and that the Bible (that is, the Old Testament,) and the Bible alone, is the religion of Israelites. The seceders constituted a new Synagogue, known by the name of the Margaret Street Synagogue. They are a highly respectable body, and their Reader, the Rev. W. Bresslau, is known to us as a gentleman of ability and character. A Cherem, or act of excommunication, was shortly directed against them by Chief Rabbi Herschell, cutting them off from the communion and privileges of the orthodox Jew.

Of the sixty or seventy deputies who assembled at the annual meeting of the Board, it appears that four gentlemen, Messrs. Jonassohn, Elkin, Ellis, and Davis, chosen by four orthodox Provincial Synagogues, Sunderland, Portsmouth, Chatham, and Norwich—were members of the heterodox congregation of Margaret Street. A formal objection was at once raised to their taking their seats. In anticipation of the proceedings of the day, the opinion of Sir F. Thesiger and Mr. Badeley had been obtained, whether the Board was entitled to examine into the personal sentiments of men, admitted to be duly elected by recognized constituencies. The opinion was in the affirmative. Counsel held, that though the Board has no religious functions, it is a body of religionists, charged with the interests of Jews, as such. If, therefore, the Board is of opinion that a man has ceased to be a Jew, it may reject him, however constitutionally chosen. A division was consequently taken on the question that the four deputies be rejected. Thirty voted for, thirty against their admission. The casting vote was given by Sir Moses Montefiore, and by that vote they were excluded.

It would exceed the limits of this article to describe the intense party excitement which this result has evoked. The Rothschilds voted with the minority. Alderman Salomons, who also did so, in a published address says, "What I presume I must call the religious element in the Board [Sir Moses Montefiore's party] is evidently quite prepared to carry the seed of discord, hitherto confined to the metropolis, into the bosom of every congregation in the kingdom; to maintain its false position; and both within and without the community, take all the consequences of this struggle." The Board of Management of the New Synagogue, Great St. Helen's, London, have expressed "their sense of the enlightened views and public spirit" displayed in the letter of Alderman Salomons. The Hebrew Observer, a weekly journal, says, "We say it with deep grief, the struggle is renewed, and we apprehend that it will be carried on more fiercely than ever."

These expectations are being fully realized. The minority have resolved that no lesser remedy will suffice for the crisis, than to insist on the repeal of the Cherem lying upon the body of the seceders. They say that it is not enough to press the admission into the board of the rejected deputies, but that their ecclesiastical excommunication must be nullified. A crowded assembly was addressed at Manchester on the 29th ult., by Mr. T. Theodore, who, in a lecture of great learning and ability, is said to have satisfied men of all parties that "the Members of the Margaret Street Synagogue are not legally under any sentence of excommunication."

The entire party of movement and of progress are committed to this course, which involves the principle that the reception of the Talmud, or oral tradition, as of equal obligation with the Word of God, is not binding upon Israelites. If the Cherem is taken off from the Margaret Street Synagogue, it will amount to an admission that nothing is binding upon Israel but the Scriptures. Should this be so, our readers will believe with us, that the time to favor Zion is not distant. The impartial prayerful use of the Old Testament, as the only rule of faith and practice, must lead men to seek for the Messiah—to seek till they find. [London Christian Times.

A schism, similar to the one described in the above article, has existed for some years among the Jews on the continent of Europe and in the East. The seceders are called Karaites, or Jews who keep by the text of the word of God and reject traditions. They abound most in the Crimea, and hence some erroneously give that country the honor of originating the name. Their prayer-book is a beautiful compilation, being taken almost entirely from the Scriptures, with some hymns; and they do not omit any book of the Bible in the Scriptures, as some have asserted. The other Jews hate this sect more than they do the Gentiles. [London Record.

CONSOLATION FOR THE LONELY.

There is a land where beauty cannot fade,
Nor sorrow dim the eye;
Where true love shall not droop nor be dismayed,
And none shall ever die!
Where is that land—oh, where?
For I would hasten there.
Tell me—I fain would go;
For I am wearied with a heavy woe!
The beautiful have left me all alone,
The true, the tender from my path have gone!
Oh! guide me with that hand,
If thou dost know that land;
For I am burdened with oppressive care,
And I am weak and fearful with despair.
Where is it? Tell me where!

Friend, thou must trust in Him who trod before
The desolate path of life;
Must bear in meekness, as He meekly bore,
Sorrow, and pain, and strife!
Think how the Son of God
These thorny paths hath trod;
Think how He longed to go,
Yet tarried out, for thee, the appointed woe;
Think of His weariness in places dim,
Where no man comforted or cared for Him!
Think of the blood-like sweat
With which His brow was wet—
Yet how He prayed, unaided and alone,
In that great agony, "Thy will be done!"
Friend, do not thou despair;
Christ, from his heaven of heavens will hear thy prayer.

A SERMON ON OLD AGE.

A Sermon on Old Age, by Theodore Parker of Boston, has been printed. From a notice of it by the New York Tribune we copy the following:—

His text is a jewel in itself, though not to be found in the inspired canon. Pity it is that he was obliged to go to the apocrypha for a frontispiece to his sermon. "As the clear light is upon the holy candle-stick, so is the beauty of the face in ripe age." The subject is opened as follows:

I have often been asked to preach a Sermon of Old Age, and hitherto have declined, on the ground that I could not speak exactly from internal experience, but only from outward observation; and I hope to be able at some future time to speak on the theme; certainly, if I live, I may correct this present infirmity. To-day I will try, only asking all old persons to forgive the imperfections of this discourse; for they know what I only see. But as I was born into the arms of a father then two and fifty years old, who lived to add yet another quarter of a century thereunto; and as my cradle was rocked by a grandmother who had more than four-score years at my birth, and nearly a hundred when she ceased to be mortal; and as my first Christian ministry was attending upon old age, I think I know something about the character of men and women whom time makes venerable.

The analogies of old age with the universal processes of nature, are set forth in the subjoined passage:

There is a period when the apple-tree blossoms with its fellows of the wood and field. How fair a time it is! All nature is woosome and winning; the material world celebrates its vegetable loves; and the flower-bells, touched by the winds of spring, usher in the universal marriage of Nature. Beast, bird, insect, reptile, fish, plant, lichen, with their prophetic colors spread, all float forward on the tide of new life. Then comes the summer. Many a blossom falls fruitless to the ground, littering the earth with beauty, never to be of use. Thick leaves hide the process of creation which first blushed public in the flowers, and now unseen goes on. For so life's most deep and fruitful hours are hid in mystery. Apples are growing on every tree; all summer long they grow, and in early autumn. At length the fruit is fully formed; the leaves begin to fall, letting the sun approach more near. The apple hangs there yet—not to grow, only to ripen. Weeks long it clings to the tree; it gains nothing in size and weight. Externally, there is increase of beauty. Having finished the form from within, Nature brings out the added grace of color. It is not a tricky fashion painted on, but an expression which of itself comes out—a fragrance and a loveliness of the apple's innermost. Within, at the same time, the component elements are changing. The apple grows mild and pleasant. It softens, sweetens; in one word, it mellows. Some night, the vital forces of the tree get drowsy, and the autumn, with gentle breath, just shakes the bough; the expectant fruit lets go its hold, full grown, full ripe, full colored too, and with plump and happy sound the apple falls into the autumn's lap; and the spring's marriage promise is complete.

Such is the natural process which each fruit goes through—blooming, growing, ripening.

The same divine law is appropriate for every kind of animal, from the lowest reptile up to imperial man. It is very beautiful. The parts of the process are perfect; the whole is complete. Birth is human blossom; youth, manhood, they are summer growth; old age is ripeness. The hands let go the mortal bough; that is natural death. It is a dear, good God who orders all for the apple tree and for mankind.

The attachment of old age to the Past, is illustrated by a parable:

An old Poem of the North tells of a brave boy, who in his earlier days found his mother's cottage too narrow, mourned at tending the goats on the mountain side, and felt his heart swell in him, like a brook from the melting of the snow, when he saw a ship shoot like an arrow into the bay. He ran from his mother and the goats. The Viking took him on board. The wind swelled the sails. He saw the hill top sink in the blue deep, and was riotously glad. He took his father's sword in hand, and swore to conquer him houses and land by the sea. He also is a Viking. He has been all over the Mediterranean coast, and conquered him houses and lands by the sea; now, in his old age, his palace in Byzantium is a weariness to him, and he longs for the little cottage of his mother. He dreams of the goats; all day the kids bleat for him. He enters a little bark; he sails for the Scandinavian coast, and goes to the very cottage too narrow for his childhood, and eats again the barken bread of Sweden, and drinks its bitter beer; bares his forehead to the storm; sits on the rocks, and there he dies. "Bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt," said old Jacob, "but I will lie with my fathers; bury me in their burying-place."

Then the scholar becomes an antiquary; he likes not young men unless he knew their grandfathers before. The young woman looks in the newspaper for the marriages, the old man for the deaths. The young man's eye looks forward; the world is "all before him, where to choose." It is a hard world; he does not know it; he works little, and hopes much. The middle-aged man looks around at the present; he has found out that it is a hard world; he hopes less and works more. The old man looks back on the fields he has trod; "this is the tree I planted; this is my footstep," and he loves his old house, his old carriage, cat, dog, staff, and friend. In lands where the vine grows, I have seen an old man sit all day long, a sunny autumn day, before his cottage door, in a great arm-chair, his old dog couched at his feet, in the genial sun. The autumn wind played with the old man's venerable hairs; above him on the wall, purpling in the sunlight, hung the full clusters of the grape, ripening and maturing yet more. The two were just alike; the wind stirred the vine leaves, and they fell; stirred the old man's hair, and it whitened yet more. Both were waiting for the spirit in them to be fully ripe. The young man looks forward; the old man looks back. How long the shadows lie in the setting sun; the steeple a mile long reaching across the plain, as the sun stretches out the hills in grotesque dimensions. So are the events of life in the old man's consciousness.

After his favorite custom, Mr. Parker draws upon his fancy for a portrait to illustrate the principles which he wishes to enforce. We copy his sketch of a fair old age in the person of a universal "Aunt:"

What a beautiful thing is the old age which crowns a noble life, of rich or poor! How fair are the latter days of many a woman—wife, mother, sister, aunt, friend—whom you and I have known! How proud were the last years of Washington; the old age of Franklin! How beautiful is his late autumn is Alexander Von Humboldt! The momentum of manliness bears on the venerable man beyond his four and eightieth year. There you see the value of time. It takes much to make a great [illegible] as to make a great estate. No amount of [illegible] that God ever gives man could enable one to achieve at forty what Von Humboldt has only done at more than eighty. It was so with Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Leibnitz, every great man who has awed the world by the action of a mighty intellect, with corresponding culture.

These are men of high talent, station, genius perhaps. But the old age of a Quaker tailor in Philadelphia and New York was not a whit less fair. The philanthrophy of Isaac Hopper blessed the land; in his manhood it enriched the world; in his old age it beautified his own life, giving an added glory to his soul.

How many farmers, mechanics, traders, servants, how many mothers, wives, and aunts, have you and I known, whose last days were a handsome finish to a handsome life; the Christian ornament on the tall column of time! Their old age was the slow setting of the sun, which left

"The smile of his departure spread
O'er the warm colored heaven and ruddy mountain head."

Miss Kindly is aunt to everybody, and has been so long that none remember to the contrary. The little children love her; she helped their grandmothers to bridal ornaments three-score years ago. Nay, this boy's grandfather found the way to college lay through her pocket. Generations not her own rise up and call her blessed. To this man's father her patient toil gave the first start in life. That great fortune—when it was a seed, she carried it in her hand. That wide river of reputation ran out of the cup her bounty filled. Now she is old; very old. The little children, who cling about her, with open mouth and great round eyes, wonder that anybody should ever be so old; or that Aunt Kindly ever had a mother to kiss her mouth. To them she is coëval with the sun, and, like that, an institution of the country. At Christmas they think she is the wife of Saint Nicholas himself, such an advent is there of blessings from her hand. She has helped lay a Messiah in many a poor man's crib.

Her hands are thin; her voice feeble; her back is bent; she walks with a staff—the best limb of the three. She wears a cap of antique pattern, yet of her own nice make. She has great round spectacles, and holds her book away off the other side of the candle when she reads. For more than sixty years she has been a special providence to the family. How she used to go forth—the very charity of God—to soothe, and heal, and bless! How industrious are her hands! how thoughtful and witty that fertile mind! Her heart has gathered power to love in all the eighty-six years of her toilsome life. When the birth-angel came to a related house, she was there to be the mother's mother; ay, mother also to the new-born baby's soul. And when the wings of death flapped in the street, and shook a neighbor's door, she smoothed down the pillow for the fainting head; she soothed and cheered the spirit of the waiting man, opening the curtains of heaven, that he might look through and see the welcoming face of the dear Infinite Mother; nay, she put the wings of her own strong, experienced piety under him, and sought to bear him up.

Now these things are passed by. No, they are not passed by; they are remembered in the memory of the dear God, and every good deed she has done is treasured in her own heart. The bulb shuts up the summer in its breast, which in winter will come out a fragrant hyacinth. Stratum after stratum her good works are laid up, imperishable, in the geology of her character.

It is near noon, now. She is alone. She has been thoughtful all day, talking inwardly so herself. The family notice it, and say nothing. In her chamber, from a private drawer, the takes a little casket, and from thence a book, gilt-edged and clasped; but the clasp is worn, the gilding is old, the binding faded by long use. Her hands tremble as she opens it. First she reads her own name, on the fly leaf; only her Christian name, "Agnes," and the date. Sixty-eight years ago this day it was written there, in a clear, youthful, clerkly hand—with a little tremble in it, as if the heart beat over-quick. It is very well worn, the dear old Bible. It opens of its own accord at the fourteenth chapter of St. John. There is a little folded piece of paper there; it touches the first verse and the twenty-seventh. She sees neither; she reads both out of her soul: "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God; believe also in me." "Peace I leave with you. My peace give I unto you. Not as the world giveth give I unto you." She opens the paper. There is a little brown dust in it; perhaps the remnant of a flower. She takes the precious relic in her hand, made cold by emotion. She drops a tear on it, and the dust is transfigured before her eyes; it is a red rose of the spring, not quite half blown, dewy fresh. She is old no longer. It is not Aunt Kindly now; it is sweet Agnes, as the maiden of eighteen was eight-and-sixty years ago, one day in May, when all nature was woosome and winning, and every flower-bell rung in the marriage of the year. Her lover had just put that red rose of the spring into her hand, and the good God another in her cheek, not quite half-blown, dewy fresh. The young man's arm is round her; her brown curls fall on his shoulder; she feels his breath on her face, his cheek on hers; their lips join, and, like two morning dew-drops in that rose, their two loves rushes into one. But the youth must wander to a far land. They will think of each other as they look at the North Star. She bids him take her Bible. He saw the North Star hang over the turrets of many a foreign town. His soul went to God—there is as straight a road from India as from any other spot—and his Bible came back to her—the Divine love in it, without the human lover, the leaf, turned down at the blessed words at St. John, first and twenty-seventh of the fourteenth chapter. She put the rose there to note the spot; what marks the thought holds now the symbol of their youthful love. Now to-day her soul is with him, her maiden soul with his angel soul; and one day the two, like two dew-drops, will rush into one immortal wedlock, and the old age of earth shall become eternal youth in the Kingdom of Heaven.

LETTER OF OLIVER CROMWELL.

H. Stevens, American agent, recently purchased for £36 an interesting autograph letter of Oliver Cromwell, addressed "For my esteemed friend Mr. Cotton, pastor to the church at Boston, in New England, theise. October 2, 1651." This letter was written shortly after the battle of Worcester. Cromwell alludes to the difficulties he had experienced in treating with the Scottish party, "whoe were," he says, "I verily thinke, godly, but through weaknesse, and the subtiltye of Sathan, inuolued in interests against the Lord and his people. With what tendernesse we haue proceeded with such, and that in synceritye, our papers (which I suppose you haue seen) will in part manifest, and I giue you some comfortable assurance off. The Lord hath maruelously appeared euen against them, and now againe, when all the power was deuolued into the Scottish Kinge and the malignant partie, they inuadeinge England, and the Lord rayned upon them such snares as the enclosed will shew, only the narratiue is short in this, that of theire whole armie, when the narratiue was framed not five of their whole armie were returned. * * What is the Lord a doeing? What prophesies are now fulfilinge? Whoe is a God like ours?" The letter concludes with many expressions of Christian sympathy.

TO DESTITUTE CHURCHES.

Do not ask any one to become your pastor, till you can look upon the ministerial office as Christ's institution for promoting the growth of his mystical body. Pastors and teachers are enumerated with other gifts that our Lord bestowed upon the Church when he ascended on high. Eph. 4 : 11. He intended that his people should appreciate them, set a high value upon them, and diligently avail themselves of them. Yet some are so accustomed to speak disrespectfully of the ministry, that they not only suffer the evil consequences to themselves, but do much to bring the office into contempt with others. This grieves the Spirit. In slighting the gifts of Christ, we slight Christ himself. Moreover, nothing tends more to break a godly minister's heart, and to paralyze his exertions, than the semi-infidel language of those church members who are forever speaking of the ministry as if it were but a common trade or profession. Ministers can put up with this language from the world—from avowed infidels they expect it; but when it springs up among their own brethren, and is rung in their ears time after time, it crushes their spirits.

2. Do not choose a pastor, till you can find one whom you consider competent to instruct you. If you intend not to heed his instructions, do not insult him so much as to ask for them. If you know every thing already, why employ a teacher? There seems to be a set of persons in almost every church, who are always active enough in calling a pastor, but have not the least idea of abiding by his instructions when they get him. It is not for themselves that they want a pastor, but (it may be) for the women and children. Ministers, however, suppose it a part of their duty to instruct their hearers in the doctrine of truth; and though they do not claim to be regarded as infallible in their teachings, they do expect a respectful attention to what they say, as well as a disposition on the part of their hearers to compare every thing with the word of God.

3. Do not call a pastor, till you are prepared to hold up his hands. We allude, now, not so much to that temporal support which it is absolutely necessary for him to have, that he may prosecute his work efficiently, as to a readiness to coöperate with him in his efforts to forward the cause of Christ. In particular, let him not have to complain of your want of interest in the prayer meeting. There is the place where the pastor is brought to feel whether he stands alone, or has good efficient brethren to work with him. It is the prayer meeting which shows whether the brethren feel their individual, personal responsibility in the work, as fellow-laborers with the pastor, or whether the pastor has to carry the church on his back. O how the minister grieves, when, going to the place for prayer, he finds himself almost alone! And what greater cause of grief still, when he discovers such an indifference to these meetings, that they cannot be sustained without his personal presence, and always have to be omitted when Providence calls him away from home! Such things are most distressing. They make him feel that he does but labor in the fire.

We allude, too, not only to the prayer meeting, but to every other method in which your personal efforts may be employed, in conjunction with his, for the advancement of the cause of religion. Let him see that he is not a hireling, employed merely to relieve you from responsibility, but that he is a leader in the work of doing good, and that his people are willing followers.

4. Do not call one, till you can look upon religion as the great and leading business of your lives. If religion is twelve, and the world thirteen, in your estimation, you are not in a fit state to appreciate the labors of a self-denying, godly minister. If you had one, you would only laugh at his solicitude for you, while your hearts would grow harder under his reproof. But most likely, in such a state of mind, God would give you just about such a minister as you are prepared to receive, namely, a worldly-minded man like yourselves, who would be captivated by the love of gain, and fail to fulfill the high trust committed to him. Such a pastor would be a curse rather than a blessing.

5. Finally, before choosing a pastor, humble yourselves before God with prayers and fasting.

In further continuing this subject, I beg to be permitted to ask a few questions, which, though they may appear to be impertinent, yet I trust the spirit that dictates them is none other than one that seeks their welfare. The first, however, I desire to ask you, which is, Do you exercise an earnest care concerning their habits and principles? If you do not, you are failing in one of the most important duties of your calling.

First, then, do you know how and where your children spend the Sabbath? Do you take them to the house of God, and to the Sabbath School, or are they at play, running the streets, hunting, fishing, sporting, or otherwise desecrating Jehovah's holy day?

Second—Are they profane? Be not offended; though you may not dream of it, perhaps they are profane! Please look into it and see.

Third—Are they in the habit of using spirituous liquors? Notwithstanding the efforts of the age, thousands of the young are forming habits which will bring with them all the miseries, shame and ruin of the drunkard! Perhaps your sons are forming these habits!

Fourth—Are they forming the filthy (!) habit of tobacco-chewing, or the more ruinous habit of tobacco-smoking? Do not excuse yourselves from the exercise of vigilance in this thing because you also are guilty in this respect.

Fifth—Do they gamble—even for pastime?

Sixth—Where do they spend their evenings—in the streets, or in some secret conclave? Remember, that our State's prison and penitentiary candidates are our "street boys" and girls.

Seventh—Do they read vile and debauching books and papers?

Eighth—What company do they keep?

Think on these things.

COMMUNION AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

In a former article on the subject of Communion, I stated that the Lord's Supper is an institution independent of all previous Jewish institutions. It was in its origin, and has been ever since, considered as exclusively a gospel institution—as a memorial of the crucifixion of the Lord Jesus Christ. And from the injunctions, "Take, eat," and, "Drink ye all of it," I understand it to be the duty of all the true disciples of Christ to commemorate his death, by eating and drinking of the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper. There seems to be a special sacredness attached to this Christian rite, and therefore special guards should be placed around it, in order to protect it from desecration. What the understanding of the earliest disciples after the resurrection was, in regard to the Christian character of those with whom they associated in this ordinance, we are not informed; but from the circumstances of their condition, as the professors of a new system of religion, despised and "every where spoken against," it is scarcely supposable that they were intruded upon in their solemn seasons of prayer and breaking bread, by heartless formalists. "They were all of one accord, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart." Such is the inspired record of these primitive disciples. With them, there could be no occasion for the inquiry as to who were the proper subjects of the ordinance, or with whom it would be proper to eat the Lord's Supper. There were no sectarian divisions among them, and none but the spiritual disciples would make the sacrifices which they made, and would voluntarily subject themselves to the reproaches which fell upon them for the sake of Christ. The idea of restricted and free communion was not then originated. The communion was like the salvation of the gospel—free for all who would believe it; and its blessings and privileges were restricted to them. Were this the condition of the church at the present time, there would be no occasion for a change in the rule or custom in regard to the communion.

But this happy state of the church did not continue long. Divisions and heresies soon disturbed her tranquillity. Men who were ambitious of preëminence, who, like Jannes and Jamres, who withstood Moses, withstood the apostles. Men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith, grievous wolves, not sparing the flock, entered in among them. Also, among themselves men arose, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. The mystery of iniquity began its discordant work while the inspired apostles were still on earth. After their departure, errors and divisions were still more rapidly and successfully promulgated; of which the early history of the church gives ample proof. As these heretical leaders increased the number of their followers, they formed different and differing churches, which adhered to the errors of their respective leaders. But they did not hold religious intercourse together, neither were they recognized by the apostolic church, so far as to admit them to their communion. For proof of this, see 2 John v. 7, 10, 11, and 3 John v. 9, 10. It is well known, that the churches which adhered to the church of Rome departed widely from the purity of the primitive church, not only in spirituality, but in their unscriptural superstitions; insomuch that the truly pious could hold no connection with that corrupt church. When the Roman Emperor, in the fourth century, espoused her cause, and sustained her by his authority, her influence became more widespread and corrupting, until Europe and Asia were filled with her abominations. The Reformation, as it is called, under Luther, Calvin, and others, was undertaken, evidently, for the purpose of forming a more scriptural organization, and of giving to the people a purer Christianity than was professed and practiced by the Papists. Though these reformers cast off many of the prominent errors and superstitions of that degraded church, they still retained others. But nothing like what is termed free communion appears to have been entertained by any order of Christians whatever, until the subversion of the papal power in England, in the reign of Henry the Eighth, in the early part of the sixteenth century, when he became the head of the English church, changed more in name than in nature. But spiritual Christianity could hold no communion with this church, which retained many of the errors and superstitions of the papists. The Reformation extended to Scotland, but the Scots could not unite with the Church of England, on account of its corruptions and worldly character. Neither could the Baptists residing in the kingdom. While the laws of England permitted such as could not conform to their church establishment to enjoy their own sentiments in quietude, they were forbidden by law to meet publicly for worship by the Conventicle Act. By the law of England, no person could hold an office in the civil, military, or navy departments, without giving evidence of having received the communion in the English church. This was a free communion; but it was all on one side. The members of that church acknowledged no other ecclesiastical organization as the church. But the various sects of Christians in the kingdom could not conscientiously meet at the communion table in the English church, so that none but the mere formalists of these sects could degrade themselves so far as to conform to their communion for the sake of office.

In the early history of the Baptists, when they were few, poor, despised, and persecuted, no other body of Christians offered them communion. And it is comparatively a late thing that Pedobaptists were willing to put themselves so far on a par with them as to own them as brethren at the communion table. When Mr. Wesley branched off from the Church of England, and preached a more spiritual religion, he brought off with him and promulgated many of the unscriptual practices of the Church of England; among which were episcopacy, aspersion, infant baptism, first-day keeping, receiving the elements of the eucharist kneeling, &c. These were all corruptions and innovations of the Romanists, retained by the English church, and sown broadcast by Mr. Wesley and his fellow laborers. Among other things, he propagated what is called free communion. Many of the other Pedobaptist sects in this country have adopted the same practice; and some of the Baptists, inconsistently, I think, have wheeled into the ranks of those who practice upon this principle. But none of these have been without restrictions on this point. So far as I have been able to learn, it is required in all such churches as are considered evangelical, that the recipients should be, in their understanding of the word, baptized, be members of some evangelical church in good standing, and in all cases hold to the doctrine of the Deity of the Son of God, and they refuse such as are Unitarian in their sentiments, so that those who hold to unrestricted communion are found principally, if not altogether, among Universalists and Unitarians. But I admit that neither the universality nor the antiquity of a practice or doctrine is sufficient ground for its retention. To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.

I have been thus particular in tracing the history of the church, to see how far the religious sentiments or practice of the various sects of Christian tended towards free communion, and we find the first inkling this way was in the unreciprocated practice of the semi-reformed English church.

I propose, in a future article, to go back to our starting point, and ascertain what the inspired apostles have said upon this subject, that will be a safe guide for us in this matter.

BOARD MEETINGS.

Abstract of Proceedings at the Meetings of the Executive Boards of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, held at New Market, N. J., April 6, 1854.

The Missionary Society.

1. After the usual introductory exercises, approval of the minutes, &c., the Corresponding Secretary read a letter from Julius M. Todd, missionary in Wisconsin, dated Jan. 1, 1854; also two letters from Solomon Carpenter, dated Shanghae, China, Nov. 27, 1853, and Jan. 19, 1854.

2. The Treasurer presented his quarterly report, showing that at the last meeting of Board there was in hand $2,445 15; since which he had received for general purposes $84 02, and for Palestine Mission and outfit $847 01; paid out, for printing Annual Report $44, remittance to O. P. Hull $80, for Palestine Mission and outfit $1802 70; balance in Treasury $1449 48.

3. The Treasurer was instructed, in all cases of making payment for missionary services, &c., to obtain and place on file the receipts of the persons to whom the money is paid.

4. Voted, that $50 be sent to Bro. J. M. Todd, to complete the appropriation in his favor for the year 1853.

5. Voted, that eight hundred dollars be sent to Solomon Carpenter and Nathan Wardner by the first convenient opportunity.

6. The Corresponding Secretary was instructed to write to our missionaries in China, and express the Board's unqualified approbation of their course in taking children to educate, as set forth in Bro. Carpenter's letter of Nov. 27, 1853.

7. The Committee on Outfit for the Palestine Mission reported progress, and asked farther time to complete their duties and make a full report.

8. The Committee in relation to the resignation by T. B. Brown of the office of Corresponding Secretary, presented a report, recapitulating the services of Bro. Brown, and expressing the Board's regret that circumstances forbid his continuing them, and their hope that his future life may be as pleasant as his official career has been useful.

9. Thomas B. Stillman presented a paper, signed by himself, Lucius Crandall, and Alfred B. Burdick, having reference to the letter of T. B. Brown and Geo. B. Utter, presented at the last meeting of the Board; the paper was, in compliance with its closing request, ordered on record.

10. Adjourned to meet at Plainfield, N. J., on First-day, July 9, 1854.

The Tract Society.

1. The Corresponding Secretary read his quarterly report, showing that since the last meeting of the Board new editions of nearly all of the Society's Tracts had been printed, and that some half a dozen parcels had been furnished to brethren in different places for gratuitous distribution; that the services of C. A. Osgood as colporteur could not be obtained; that Bro. L. M. Cottrell had served the Society to some extent as colporteur, but being unable to do so any longer, he recommended the appointment of Bro. H. C. Babcock for a couple of months; that Bro. Lucius Crandall had been engaged in the service of the Society for several weeks, but no report had been received from him; that a letter had been received from Bro. John Maxson, proposing to denote to the Society certain volumes of the "Sabbath Discussion," together with receipts for volumes left in the hands of agents, &c.

2. The Treasurer presented his report, showing that he had received $60 03, paid out $197 20, and had a balance in hand of $262 95.

3. James Bailey, T. B. Stillman, and Geo. B. Utter, were appointed a Committee to consider and report upon the question of merging this Society in the Publishing Society, as suggested in a resolution at the last Anniversary.

4. The same Committee was charged with the duty of arranging accounts between the Tract and Publishing Societies growing out of L. Crandall's agency.

5. Lucius Crandall being called upon for his report, stated that it was not yet ready.

6. Voted, that H. C. Babcock be employed as a colporteur in Western New York and Northern Pennsylvania for the term of two months.

7. The donation of Bro. John Maxson was accepted; and the Corresponding Secretary was instructed to collect the books.

8. Bro. H. H. Baker stated that he was about to bring out a small work on the subject of the Sabbath, which he desired to place in the hands of every Protestant minister in the United States. He requested the Board to appoint a Committee to confer with him on the subject, which request was granted.

9. Thomas B. Brown stated that, owing to his contemplated removal from the vicinity, it would be out of his power to serve the Society any longer as Recording Secretary, and he therefore tendered his resignation. The resignation was accepted, and E. P. Larkin appointed to fill the vacancy.

10. Adjourned to meet at Plainfield, N. J., July 9, 1854.

The Publishing Society.

1. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved.

2. The Treasurer's Report was presented and ordered on file.

3. The Corresponding Secretary presented his report of correspondence with Elds. Wm. B. Maxson, A. B. Burdick, and N. V. Hull, from which it appears that those brethren have consented to act as Corresponding Editors of the Sabbath Recorder; also, with Eld. W. B. Gillett in relation to the volume of Sermons. Accepted and ordered file.

4. The General Agent presented his report of the quarterly doings of the Society, representing the prospects of the Society as encouraging, &c.

5. The Committee on Music Book for Sabbath Schools reported in favor of the publication of the work of Eld. L. Crandall.

6. The General Agent was directed to proceed with the publication of the same.

7. Voted, that Bro. Randolph Dunham be paid in money instead of memberships a balance due him of $7 31 for advances made to the Committee from whom the Publishing Society purchased the Sabbath Recorder.

8. Voted, that Isaac S. Dunn be received a member of the Society upon the amount subscribed by Asa Dunn and the New Market Church.

9. Geo. B. Utter was re-appointed General Agent for the next financial year.

10. On motion, Geo. B. Utter and Thos. B. Brown were re-appointed Editors of the Sabbath Recorder.

11. Adjourned to meet in Plainfield, N. J., July 9, 1854.

LITERARY FESTIVAL.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

We had the pleasure of attending, March 16th, the closing exercises of the Winter Term of the "Janesville Wesleyan Seminary," conducted by Prof. A. C. SPICER and Lady; and the highly interesting and gratifying character of the exercises, induces us to present this testimonial to the readers of the Recorder, of the ability, skill, faithfulness and industry of Mr. and Mrs. Spicer, as educators.

The examination of classes occurred during the day at the Seminary, and the orations, essays, colloquies, and music, were presented in the evening at the Baptist Church. The prompt and ready answers and recitations of the students, was creditable to themselves, and showed the tact and perseverance of their teachers. We have witnessed examinations in Mr. Spicer's school before this, and we always observe this characteristic—an effort to secure absolute thoroughness of scholarship, and to enlist inquiry, investigation, energy, and independence of thought and action, from every student; and the result this time, as before, indicated that the effort was not without its reward; and the students seemed inspired with the zeal and enthusiasm of their teachers.

At an early hour in the evening, that spacious church was crowded to its utmost capacity, by an interesting audience, eager to enjoy the "intellectual feast;" while, probably, as many more, who went to participate in the pleasures, were unable to get within the house. The marked attention and quietness of the audience, throughout the entire exercises, though occupying more than four hours, showed how happily the exercises were adapted to the occasion; and the necessity frequently to suppress the applause of the multitude, indicated the interest elicited by the orations, music, and colloquies. The diction of the speakers was generally spirited and easy, and often really eloquent, and the orations seemed to possess a clearness and pointedness of thought which we have rarely ever witnessed before on such occasions. The orations on Political Corruption, Responsibilities of the Young Men of America, Youths of the Present Age, Integrity, Slavery, Improvements of the Age, and the Valedictory, each attracted much attention, and some of these have since been the subject of many encomiums.

The essays were generally excellent, and evinced much taste and care in preparation, and were mostly well read. Though the solid, substantial, and real of life, seemed to be the aim of each speaker and reader, yet we were occasionally favored with sparkles of genius, and a sprinkling of wit and humor, which afforded a pleasing variety. The colloquies presented an interesting attraction; and these, as did the orations and essays, indicated that the spirit, wants, and necessities of the present age, and of the future, had not been altogether neglected by the teachers, and were understood and appreciated by the students. They strongly plead the necessity of universal reform; the promulgation of first principles and sound morals, and their application in political, social, and religious life, true love to country, God, and right, and the equality and brotherhood of the race.

But one of the chief attractions of the exhibition was the original music, sweetly discoursed by the students, accompanied by a Seraphine, and appropriately adapted to the occasion. "Freedom's Beauty," and "Up to Action," particularly attracted our attention, and we think they may justly be ranked among the best of musical productions. But all were good, decidedly excellent; and the excellent words were so enunciated by the choir, as to be understood by the audience, and their performance frequently excited considerable sensation throughout the assembly. In short, the exhibition was one of the best we ever attended; and we take pleasure in adding, that it was universally admired, and is now said by many who have witnessed similar exercises at the East, and in the West, to be the best they ever attended.

We attended the exhibition of Mr. and Mrs. Spicer's school one year ago, which was also most excellent, and did great credit to the teachers and scholars; and we have noticed one feature in the entertainments they present to the public—an interesting characteristic—which we have never elsewhere seen, East or West. Every thing presented was original—Poetry and Music, as well as colloquies, orations, and essays—as you may see by the accompanying programme of the exercises. This never fails, under their management, to add much to the interest of such exhibitions.

Mr. Spicer and Lady deserve much credit for their perseverance and untiring labors in behalf of education, since the commencement of their labors in the West. Though surrounded by all the embarrassments incident to a new country, to which has been added for the past year a strong sectarian prejudice, yet they have earned a wide reputation, have secured the respect and esteem universally of students, and of a large number of patrons and friends, and are now denominated as among the best teachers of the country. May success crown all their future efforts.

BENEDICTION.

Leang Afa, the first Chinese convert, is still actively engaged in the service of his Master. He is, says one who recently heard him, very earnest and happy when addressing his countrymen on the subject of the great salvation.

POSTAGE IN CONGRESS.—From our abstract of proceedings in Congress, it will be seen that a proposition is up to reduce the rates of sea postage, to increase the rates of inland postage, and to require postage always in advance. The reduction of sea postage is undoubtedly just and politic; for no good reason can be given why a letter to England should be charged 24 cents, while one may go the same distance inland for 3 cents, or to California for 6 cents. The plan of advance payments is also, undoubtedly, a good one; it will save the Department from carrying a great many letters for nothing, and will simplify the accounts of postmasters. But the proposition to increase inland postage from 3 to 5 cents, will not meet with general approbation, and ought not to be entertained. The reason given for it is, that the present rates do not meet the expenses of the department. Perhaps they do not, while members of Congress are allowed to send tuns of matter in the mails free. But let the plan first be tried of making every thing carried in the mails pay its passage; then, and not till then, will it be time, if the department falls in debt, to talk about an increase of the rates. It will be hard work to make the people think they ought to pay more postage, while Congressmen and other public functionaries are allowed to send their letters, pamphlets, books, &c., for nothing.

LITERARY COMPENSATION.—Mr. Carey, in a recent pamphlet, in reference to the International Copy-right Treaty, which has been slumbering in the Senate of the United States for months past, has shown very satisfactorily, that literary labor, at least in numerous instances, is duly rewarded by publishers in this country. We are happy to find that disposition increasing among the publishing fraternity, and are gratified to add, that within a few days a tender of three thousand dollars was made to our friend Dr. W. M. Fahnestock, of Bordentown, N. J., by one of the first publishing houses in Philadelphia, to write a work on Physiology for them.

"THE PRESBYTERIAN HOUSE."—Such is the proposed name of an edifice in Philadelphia, nearly opposite the United States Mint. It was purchased a few weeks ago, by several liberal-minded gentlemen, who made a tender of the contract to the Presbyterian General Assembly, with a view of having the house used for the Assembly's publication, missionary, and educational operations, and for meetings of Boards, Committees, &c. The lot is 44 by 200 feet, and cost $40,000. The plan is to raise a fund to pay for the house and lot, and then present it all complete to the Assembly. One gentleman subscribed $1,500, and several others $1,000 each.

BEQUESTS.—The Baltimore Sun says that the late Jacob Albert of Baltimore left by his will various charitable bequests. Among them are the following: To the Protestant Orphan Asylum, on Franklin-square, $10,000; to the Female Orphan Asylum of St. Paul's Church, $10,000; to the male orphans of the same, $10,000. With regard to the portion of his estate devised to his children, it is understood to be divided as follows: $70,000 to each of the three sons, and $50,000 to each of two daughters—making a total, with the charities above specified, of $340,000. Mr. A.'s wealth, it is said, far exceeds this. In addition to his five children, Mr. A. also leaves a wife.

DISMISSING PASTORS.—The Boston correspondent of the Independent says that a few weeks since, a mutual council met to dismiss the Rev. F. A. Fiske, pastor of an Orthodox church, but refused to act, on the ground that the people were perfectly united in Mr. Fiske, and that there was no apparent cause for his leaving. "On learning that he had requested a dismission on the ground of incompetent salary, ($500,) the council advised the parish to call a meeting, raise the salary, and keep their minister. Upon this the council adjourned. The church and society have subsequently had a meeting, and voted that, much as they are attached to their minister and wish him to stay, they can not raise his salary. Next time he will be dismissed, for the council were satisfied that he could not live on his present income. It is a large parish, has fine farms and wealthy manufacturing establishments, and this is the principal society. The church itself numbers from two to three hundred members."

METHODIST "PLAN."—The Methodists have adopted the plan of monthly prayer meetings for missions, with collectors for each district, &c. The Missionary Advocate says:—

"If any further evidence of the wisdom and efficiency of the plan for 'support of missions' was necessary, we see it in the returns just made to the Baltimore and Philadelphia Annual Conferences. Last year, Baltimore Conference contributed $24,550; this year she contributes over $29,000, being an advance of twenty per cent. this year over last year. Philadelphia Conference contributed last year $14,492, this year $18,371, being an advance of 25 per cent. over last year's contribution."

THE CRYSTAL PALACE ASSOCIATION has been relieved from the legal embarrassments under which it labored, has obtained from the Legislature an extension of its charter, and is to become a permanent exhibition. It was temporarily closed on the evening of the 15th inst., to re-open with a popular re-inauguration and appropriate ceremonies on the 4th of May next.

LINCKLAEN CHURCH.—At a church meeting held in Lincklaen, N. Y., Oct. 7th, 1853, it was Resolved, That nonresident members communicate in writing or otherwise at least once in each year, or they will be considered as gone out from the church, and will lose their membership. By order and in behalf of the church.
SCHUYLER OLIN, Clerk.
LINCKLAEN, March 6, 1854.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 10.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented a large number of remonstrances against the Nebraska bill; also petitions in favor of Hansen's proposed line of steamships between Brooklyn and Europe; also petitions in favor of the Homestead bill; also petitions in favor of religious freedom to American citizens in Europe; and others in favor of a reduction of ocean postage. Mr. Fish offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling for the correspondence relative to the imprisonment at Bremen of Conrad Schmidt, a naturalized citizen of the United States, and also Dana and other American citizens at Baden. The Committee on Roads and Canals reported adversely on the proposition to give the Ohio Falls Company $300,000 to aid in constructing a marine railway around the Ohio Falls. The bill providing for the construction of a railroad to the Pacific, was then taken up and discussed.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Dean of New York moved a suspension of the rules, which was agreed to, in order to offer a resolution declaring it to be the duty and the interest of the Government of the United States to observe and maintain a strict neutrality between all European belligerents, and that in the event of a war the rights of our citizens and the security of our commerce demands the maintenance of the principles heretofore assented to and strenuously contended for by the Government, but not hitherto admitted or established by the laws of nations, that free ships make free goods, except as to articles clearly known as contraband of war, and that the neutral flag protects from unreasonable search all ships bearing it; also, that neutral property on board the vessels of belligerents is not subject to seizure or confiscation; and calling for any correspondence to establish the foregoing principles as international law, and to protect our neutral commerce in the event of war. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the General Appropriation bill. Mr. McDonald of Maine and Mr. Faulkner of Virginia addressed the Committee in favor of the Nebraska bill.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 11.

In the SENATE, numerous reports and memorials were presented and appropriately referred. Mr. Mason introduced a bill authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to extend their road to the Potomac River, at or near Washington City. The bill giving credit, for a limited time, on the duties levied on railroad iron, was then taken up. Mr. Douglas moved a substitute, suspending the duties on railroad iron from the passage of the bill until the first day of July, 1857. After a long debate on the subject, the further consideration of the bill was postponed.

In the HOUSE, a message was received from the President, transmitting additional documents relative to the Crescent City affair. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of the Interior to communicate to the House such information concerning frauds in the Pension Office as were mentioned in his annual report, and also any other similar frauds since discovered, with the nature and extent thereof. Mr. Bennett's Land bill, granting lands equally to the States, to aid in the construction of Railroads and the support of Public Schools, was then taken up, and on motion its further consideration was postponed for two weeks. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the General Appropriation bill. Mr. Cullom of Tennessee having the floor, addressed the Committee in opposition to the passage of the Nebraska bill.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 12.

In the SENATE, a letter was received from Hon. Truman Smith of Connecticut, resigning his seat as a member of that body from the 24th of May next. Petitions were presented praying that steps may be taken to colonize and civilize the Indians at Puget's Sound, Washington Territory. A memorial from the merchants of Baltimore and others was presented, praying for the repeal of all duties on diamonds and other precious stones.

In the HOUSE, after the reading of the Journal, the credentials of Judge Lancaster, Delegate from Washington Territory, were presented. The consideration of the bill empowering the Postmaster-General to contract for the transportation of the mails between New Orleans and San Francisco, according to time, was then resumed, and after a short discussion, the bill was tabled by a vote of 89 to 59. The House then went into Committee on the bill reducing and graduating the price of public lands according to the time they have been in market. The bill was discussed for one hour, when the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 13.

In the SENATE, the House bill establishing a new Land District in the Lower Peninsula of Michigan was taken up and passed. A resolution was adopted, directing inquiry, by the Committee on Public Lands, as to the expediency of granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Iron Bay, in Michigan, to Little Bay de Lequette. The Committee on Patents reported favorably upon the bill extending Hussey's patent for a reaper. Adjourned until Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported a bill modifying the rates of postage, and after a short discussion the further consideration of the bill was postponed for four weeks. [The bill proposes to charge five cents on single letters for any distance under three thousand miles, and over that distance ten cents, postage in all cases to be prepaid with postage stamps. It also proposes the same rate when it goes wholly or in part by sea as when it goes by land, namely, five cents for not exceeding three thousand miles, except in cases where we have postal treaties with foreign countries. As to newspapers and periodicals, the bill proposes to repeal so much of the former law as makes a reduction of fifty per cent. on the prepayment of postage.] The Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill modifying the Judicial system of the United States. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and considered the bill to Graduate the Price of Public Lands. The amendments were debated, and several of a verbal character were adopted, when the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House. [The bill provides for the sale of lands which have been in the market for ten years at $1 an acre; fifteen years, seventy-five cents; twenty years, fifty cents; twenty-five years, twenty-five cents; thirty years or more, twelve and a half cents.]

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 14.

In the HOUSE, the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the Public Lands was passby a vote of 83 to 64. A message was received from the President, transmitting a letter from Capt. Ingraham, dated Smyrna, July 3, 1853, to the Secretary of the Navy, relative the release of Martin Koszta. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Senate's amendments to the West Point Academy bill, and after a brief discussion the Committee rose and the House adjourned until Second-day.

European News.

By the steamers Hermann, America, and Arctic, we have European dates to April 5th, ten days later than before received.

War has at length been declared. The Royal Message was read March 23d in both Houses of Parliament; by Lord Aberdeen in the Lords, and by Lord J. Russell in the Commons. It describes the measures about to be taken as "active steps to oppose the encroachments of Russia upon Turkey."

Simultaneously with the English declaration, Louis Napoleon has communicated a similar message to his Senate and Corps Législatif.

The declaration of war against Russia could no longer be delayed, after Captain Blackwood, the bearer of the Anglo-French ultimatissimum to the Czar, had returned, with the answer that Russia would give to that paper no answer at all.

On the 12th a treaty of triple-alliance was signed between France, England and Turkey, but notwithstanding the personal application of the Sultan to the Grand Mufti, the latter supported by the corps of the Ulemas, refused to issue his fetva sanctioning the stipulation about the changes in the situation of the Christians in Turkey, as being in contradiction with the precepts of the Koran.

War having now been declared, both by Great Britain and France, the preparations for hostilities were being hastened by the British Government. It has been finally decided to send the entire English cavalry force destined for the East through France, embarking it on the Mediterranean at Marseilles. No other portion of the British contingent force proceeds by that route. Eighty transports were to be attached to the British land force in the East, divided into three squadrons, each of which is to be under a senior naval officer.

Lord Bloomfield, the British Minister at Berlin, telegraphed to Sir Charles Napier the declaration of war, with instructions to commence hostilities.

The Russians were making stern preparations for hostilities in the Baltic. It was supposed that the first collision would occur at Vesel Islands. All the lighthouses and buoys are removed, and formidable fleets of gunboats are collected in shallow waters at the principal points. Masses of rock are dragged along the ice to intricate parts of the Channel, to block it when the ice shall melt. All the houses in Cronstadt not capable of defense are pulled down. New batteries were erecting everywhere, and 200 additional gun-boats had been ordered forthwith.

A telegraphic dispatch dated Ibralia, March 23, at noon, declares that 18,000 Russians had crossed the Danube near Gedschid. The Turks retreated before them. About 30,000 would have crossed by nightfall.

Another dispatch from Vienna, of the 28th March, affirms positively that 35,000 Russians passed the Danube on the 23d, without meeting with any resistance. General Lüders was supporting these movements from Galatz.

The Russians had suffered a defeat at the hands of the Turks on the 15th March, when Gen. Gorchakoff wished to depart from the Island opposite Tourtoukai. His troops had already occupied the bridge which had been built, when some Turks fired upon it and destroyed it. The bridge was carried away by the current with all those upon it. The loss of the Russians was 2,000 men. The Turks suffered no loss.

The French Minister of Commerce had informed the various Chambers of Commerce throughout France, that letters of marque will not be granted to American vessels, and that the Federal Government had declared to the French Minister that acts so contrary to the rights of nations would not be tolerated in the Union.

The Greek insurrection was reviving, but the Turks hold the fortress, and have 8,000 troops in Epirus. They have as yet had only one or two unimportant recontres with the insurgents.

The Declaration of War.

It is with deep regret that Her Majesty announces the failure of her anxious and protracted endeavors to preserve for her people and for Europe the blessings of peace.

The unprovoked aggression of the Emperor of Russia against the Sublime Porte has been persisted in with such disregard of consequences, that after the rejection by the Emperor of Russia of terms which the Emperor of Austria, the Emperor of the French, and the King of Prussia, as well as Her Majesty, considered just and equitable, Her Majesty is compelled by a sense of what is due to the honor of her Crown, to the interests of her people, and to the independence of the States of Europe, to come forward in defense of an ally whose territory is invaded, and whose dignity and independence are assailed.

Her Majesty, in justification of the course she is about to pursue, refers to the transactions in which Her Majesty has been engaged.

The Emperor of Russia had some cause of complaint against the Sultan with reference to the settlement, which His Highness had sanctioned, of the conflicting claims of the Greek and Latin Churches to a portion of the Holy Places of Jerusalem and its neighborhood. To the complaint of the Emperor of Russia on this head justice was done, and Her Majesty's Embassador at Constantinople had the satisfaction of promoting an arrangement to which no exception was taken by the Russian Government.

But, while the Russian Government repeatedly assured the Government of Her Majesty that the mission of Prince Menchikoff to Constantinople was exclusively directed to the settlement of the question of the Holy Places at Jerusalem, Prince Menchikoff himself pressed upon the Porte other demands of a far more serious and important character, the nature of which he in the first instance endeavored, as far as possible, to conceal from Her Majesty's Embassador. And these demands, thus studiously concealed, affected, not the privileges of the Greek Church at Jerusalem, but the position of many millions of Turkish subjects in their relations to their sovereign the Sultan.

These demands were rejected by the spontaneous decision of the Sublime Porte.

Two assurances had been given to Her Majesty—one, that the mission of Prince Menchikoff only regarded the Holy Places; the other, that his mission would be of a conciliatory character.

In both respects Her Majesty's just expectations were disappointed.

Demands were made which, in the opinion of the Sultan, extended to the substitution of the Emperor of Russia's authority for his own over a large portion of his subjects, and those demands were enforced by a threat; and when Her Majesty learned that, on announcing the termination of his mission, Prince Menchikoff declared that the refusal of his demands would impose upon the Imperial Government the necessity of seeking a guarantee by its own power, Her Majesty thought proper that her fleet should leave Malta, and, in coöperation with that of His Majesty the Emperor of the French, take up its station in the neighborhood of the Dardanelles.

So long as the negotiation bore an amicable character, Her Majesty refrained from any demonstration of force. But when, in addition to the assemblage of large military forces on the frontier of Turkey, the Embassador of Russia intimated that serious consequences would ensue from the refusal of the Sultan to comply with unwarrantable demands, Her Majesty deemed it right, in conjunction with the Emperor of the French, to give an unquestionable proof of her determination to support the sovereign rights of the Sultan.

The Russian Government has maintained that the determination of the Emperor to occupy the Principalities was taken in consequence of the advance of the fleets of England and France. But the menace of invasion of the Turkish territory was conveyed in Count Nesselrode's Note to Redshid Pasha of the 19th (31st) of May, and restated in his dispatch to Baron Brunow of the 20th of May (1st of June,) which announced the determination of the Emperor of Russia to order his troops to occupy the Principalities, if the Porte did not within a week comply with the demands of Russia.

The dispatch to Her Majesty's Embassador at Constantinople, authorizing him in certain specified contingencies to send for the British fleet, was dated the 31st of May, and the order sent direct from England to Her Majesty's Admiral to proceed to the neighborhood of the Dardanelles was dated the 2d of June.

The determination to occupy the Principalities was, therefore, taken before the orders for the advance of the combined squadrons were given.

The Sultan's Minister was informed that unless he signed within a week, and without the change of a word, the Note proposed to the Porte by Prince Menchikoff on the eve of his departure from Constantinople, the Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia would be occupied by Russian troops. The Sultan could not accede to so insulting a demand; but, when the actual occupation of the Principalities took place, the Sultan did not, as he might have done in the exercise of his undoubted right, declare war, but addressed a protest to his allies.

Her Majesty, in conjunction with the sovereigns of Austria, France and Prussia, has made various attempts to meet any just demands of the Emperor of Russia without affecting the dignity and independence of the Sultan; and had it been the sole object of Russia to obtain security for the enjoyment by the Christian subjects of the Porte of their privileges and immunities, she would have found it in the offers that have been made by the Sultan. But, as that security was not offered in the shape of a special and separate stipulation with Russia, it was rejected. Twice has this offer been made by the Sultan, and recommended by the Four Powers—once by a note originally prepared at Vienna, and subsequently modified by the Porte—once by the proposal of bases of negotiation agreed upon at Constantinople on the 31st of December, and approved at Vienna on the 13th of January, as offering to the two parties the means of arriving at an understanding in a becoming and honorable manner.

It is thus manifest, that a right for Russia to interfere in the ordinary relations of Turkish subjects to their sovereign, and not the happiness of Christian communities in Turkey, was the object sought for by the Russian Government; to such a demand the Sultan would not submit, and His Highness, in self-defense, declared war upon Russia; but Her Majesty, nevertheless, in conjunction with her allies, has not ceased her endeavors to restore peace between the contending parties.

The time has, however, now arrived when, the advice and remonstrances of the Four Powers having proved wholly ineffectual, and the military preparations of Russia becoming daily more extended, it is but too obvious that the Emperor of Russia has entered upon a course of policy which, if unchecked, must lead to the destruction of the Ottoman empire.

In this conjuncture Her Majesty feels called upon, by regard for an ally, the integrity and independence of whose empire have been recognized as essential to the peace of Europe—by the sympathies of her people with right against wrong—by a desire to avert from her dominions most injurious consequences, and to save Europe from the preponderance of a power which has violated the faith of treaties, and defies the opinion of the civilized world—to take up arms, in conjunction with the Emperor of the French, for the defense of the Sultan.

Her Majesty is persuaded that in so acting she will have the cordial support of her people; and that the pretext of zeal for the Christian religion will be used in vain to cover an aggression undertaken in disregard of its holy precepts, and of its pure and beneficent spirit.

Her Majesty humbly trusts that her efforts may be successful, and that, by the blessing of Providence, peace may be reëstablished on safe and solid foundations.

WESTMINSTER, March 28, 1854.

The Fourth Congregational Church in this City have made their pastor, the Rev. Henry O. Schermerhorn, a substantial present of $500, as a token of their regard for his exertions and eminently successful labors among them.

FUGITIVES FROM SLAVERY.—The Toronto Freeman of April 1st says: The arrivals by the Underground Road, during the past week, have been quite numerous. Virginia and Maryland seem to be less attractive than the ice mountains of Canada, to many in those States, judging from the extraordinary efforts they make to get away, and the preference they express for their present condition. It must be exceedingly trying to the good masters—for they are all good in their own estimation—to have to endure the loss of such "fat and sleek" servants. Those we have seen and conversed with are intelligent, for their opportunities, and if they improve those within their reach, as they seem anxious to do, they will be valuable accessions to our emigrant population. We have, among the late arrivals, three promising persons named Mercer, Gillman and Clayton, and a clever family named Meredith—all, we believe, from the nursery of Presidents, and all making industrious efforts. The past week other arrivals of fugitives took place.

The Detroit Democrat, under the head of "Still they come," adds: Eight good healthy appearing "chattels" arrived on the other side of Jordan, (i. e. Canada,) by the U. G. R. R. Line. Great credit is due to the engineers and conductors on the route, for bringing them safe through without stoppage. They are from Kentucky, and are worth about $10,000.

THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK had not completed its business when the time expired, last week, for which it can constitutionally take pay. It held on, however, and will probably adjourn in the course of the present week. Thomas Kirkpatrick, the State Prison Inspector, has made a Report to the Legislature on the present financial condition of the State Prisons, which indicates a frightful load of debt now hanging over the Prisons, that the State will of course be compelled ultimately to shoulder. The Governor having vetoed the bill authorizing a commission to inquire into the management of our State Prisons, both Houses passed the bill over the veto by a two-thirds vote. The Brooklyn Consolidation bill was passed. By this bill Williamsburgh and Bushwick become integral portions of the City of Brooklyn.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Washington, Friday, April 14, 1854, says: The news from Havana is very important, and of a belligerent character. The Captain-General's organ contained an abusive article on the President's Message, and charged Consul Robertson with falsehood. Mr. Robertson addressed a note to the Captain-General, inquiring if the article was authorized or sanctioned, but no notice whatever was taken of this note. Mr. Robertson then laid the Government paper and note before Commodore Newton, on board the frigate Columbia, who refused to offer the accustomed salute to the Spanish flag. Mr. Robertson would have left the Island, had not the Commodore pursued this course.

The United States Court, through Judge Nelson, have rendered a decision, establishing the validity of Blake's patent for fire and weather proof paint. The validity of the paint being thus established in a Court at law, the patentee will not again be compelled to try it before a Jury, but can bring his suit in a Court of Equity, which (after the patent has been established as above) will grant an immediate injunction against any party who is making, selling or using the fire proof paint in violation of his patent, and appoint a Master in Chancery, before whom the damages already sustained by the patentee will be assessed.

Great anxiety is felt for the safety of the steamship City of Glasgow, which sailed from Glasgow for New York several weeks ago with a large list of passengers. The Washington Star says that the fears entertained for her safety will probably induce the Secretary of the Treasury to order two revenue cutters to go in search of her, "as soon as there may be information received which may serve to direct, in some measure, to the right quarter in which to cruise to that end."

There has been $275,000 subscribed to the stock of the Oswego and Troy Railroad. The Troy Whig says: "Gerrit Smith subscribed $50,000, and will lend his powerful influence to the enterprise. Oswego City and County will subscribe $500,000, and it is now pretty well ascertained, that along the route between Oswego and the west bank of the Hudson, a bona fide cash subscription of not less than $1,500,000 will be obtained, exclusive of the right of way.

A dispatch dated Washington, Saturday, April 8, 1854, says: One of the largest Ecclesiastical Councils (consisting of about 150 Ministers and Delegates) is now in session in this city to install the Rev. Alex. Duncanson as pastor of the First Congregational Church. They are about to go up in a body to call upon the President by invitation.

Mr. Oliver H. Lee, the former Superintendent of the Hudson River Railroad, has been appointed Vice-President in place of Mr. Nelson J. Beach, who, in addition to his former duties of Superintendent of Construction, has been appointed Purchasing Agent of materials and supplies.

Antioch College, Ohio, had 250 students when it had been but five months in operation, and had already rejected 1,000 applicants for want of accommodations. Its friends are now raising a fund of $100,000 to endow it; $25,000 of it has already been subscribed by the Unitarians of this City.

Died, at Philadelphia, on Friday morning, April 7, Col. Christopher G. Perry, eldest son of the late Commodore O. H. Perry, in the 43d year of his age. Col. P. left Newport, R. I., about two weeks before, for the purpose of visiting the South for the benefit of his health, but he was unable to proceed farther than Philadelphia.

It is stated that the whole number of Jews in England is only 30,000, of whom 20,000 are located in London. Russia contains $10\frac{1}{4}$ millions, Constantinople 80,000, and India 17,000. It is also stated that, out of the 20,000 in London, 2000 are baptized Christians.

The Executive Committee of the National Industrial Congress have issued a call for the holding of the Ninth Session of the Congress, which meets at Trenton, N. J., on the first Wednesday in June next.

A destructive conflagration occurred at Jacksonville, Florida, on Wednesday afternoon, April 5th. Seventy buildings were destroyed, including twenty-three stores.

A dispatch dated Boston, Saturday, April 15, 1854, says: The reported failure of the Cochituate Bank to-day led to a great run upon it. Specie and current bills were paid out up to 1 o'clock, when the officers declined making further payments. The securities are considered good, and it is thought that billholders will be paid in full. The suspension of the bank is attributed to the failure of one of its officers, who is largely interested in iron manufacturing. He is said to owe the bank $100,000.

The slave-hunters appear to be particularly busy in Wisconsin. At the last accounts they were in pursuit of a female, about 24 years of age, nearly white, and beautiful, who has been residing for some time in Kenosha. But the matter some how got out, and when the kidnappers arrived in that city, the bird had flown, having taken the express train for Canada several hours previous to their arrival.

Rev. T. J. Sawyer, (Universalist,) we see stated in a journal of his denomination, has been settled as Pastor of the Orchard-st. congregation, originally built up by him, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, to which the Society added a free gift in hand of $1,200. We believe his salary when originally settled over this Society was $500, and then he had to take his chance of being able to collect it.

Since the Nebraska scheme was introduced, Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, have spoken through their legislatures, and New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, through the ballot-box. New England is on the record UNANIMOUS. Six "settlers" for the new territory.

Mount Vernon, O., was visited by another hurricane on the evening of the 9th, which unroofed the Court House at that place, and did considerable other damage in the vicinity of that town. The damage to the Court House is stated at $1,500 or $2,000.

The Central New-York Railroad has closed all the dram shops at their Station-Houses the whole length of the road.

New York Market—April 17, 1854.

Ashes—Pots $5 81, Pearls 6 00 a 6 12.

Flour and Meal—Flour, 7 50 for Canadian, 7 50 a 8 50 for State, Michigan, and Ohio. Rye Flour 4 75 for fine. Corn Meal 3 75 for Jersey.

Grain—No sales, the advance in consequence of foreign news being too great for buyers. Rye 1 02 a 1 05. Barley 1 02 a 1 10. Barley Malt 1 22. Oats 47 a 48c. for Jersey, 49 a 54c. for State and Western. Corn 82 a 85c.

Provisions—Pork, 12 75 for prime, 14 50 for mess. Beef, 7 00 a 8 00 for country and city prime, 9 50 a 12 00 for country mess. Lard 10½c. Butter, 11 a 14c. for Ohio, 15 a 20c. for State. Cheese 10 a 12c.

Hay—50 a 60c. per 100 lbs. for common to good. Straw 44 a 50c. per 100 lbs.

In Alfred, N. Y., April 8th, by Eld. H. P. Burdick, Mr. NATHAN G. HADSELL, of Almond, to Miss AURILLA E. LEWIS, of Alfred.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., April 11th, by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr. LEROY MAXSON to Miss ELIZABETH COON, all of West Edmeston.

DIED,

In Amity, N. Y., April 11, after a short season of illness, HANNAH ROGERS, relict of Jesse Rogers, in the eighty-fifth year of her age. Sister Rogers had been for many years a "mother in Israel." No words the writer could utter can deepen the impression upon the minds of those who knew her, that she was a true believer in Jesus of Nazareth. When death came, he found her in perfect readiness for his work, believing that death was only the door to life! She had been for many years, and was at the time of her death, a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Amity. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord!" N. V. H.

In Lincklaen, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 10, 1854, HENRY OLIN, aged 71 years. Brother Olin made a profession of religion in early life, has been a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church thirty or forty years, and through life, as well as in his last illness, evinced to those around a firm reliance upon the God of Israel, and felt that for him to live was Christ, but to die would be infinite gain. The relatives have suffered an irreparable loss.

In Scott, N. Y., April 10, 1854, PELEG S. CLARKE, after a few weeks of illness, which he seemed to bear with Christian patience and resignation. He has left a widow and a large number of children to mourn their loss.

In Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., April 1, 1854, sister MARY GREENE, wife of Bro. Joseph J. Greene, formerly of Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., in the 69th year of her age. Sister Greene experienced a change of heart about forty-nine years since, in Berlin, under the labors of Eld. Wm. Satterlee. About nineteen years since she moved to this place, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church, of which she continued a member until her death. Her sufferings, which were protracted and painful, she bore with the most exemplary resignation; nor feared to "walk through the valley of the shadow of death;" her God was with her; she feared no evil. Worn with disease, and cheered by faith, she sleeps in hope. J. S.

To Carpenters.

FIFTEEN or twenty good journeymen House Carpenters can find steady employment with the undersigned, if application is made soon.

First-class workmen will be paid sixteen to seventeen and one half cents per hour. Board is two dollars seventy-five cents per week. C. MAXSON & CO.

WESTERLY, R. I., April 3d, 1854.

Eastern Association.

THE Eastern Association will hold its Eighteenth Anniversary with the Church in Greenmanville, Ct., commencing on the Fifth-day preceding the fourth Sabbath in May, (the 25th,) at 10 o'clock A. M. Introductory Sermon by Eld Joel Greene, of Rockville, R. I.; alternate, Walter B. Gillett, of Shiloh, N. J.

S. S. GRISWOLD, Secretary.

☞ The Executive Committee will hold its annual session at the same place on the morning of the Anniversary, at 9 o'clock A. M. By a vote of the Committee, at its semi-annual meeting, the churches of the Association were requested to forward to the Treasurer, A. M. Babcock, of Westerly, R. I., on or before the session of the Association, their respective contributions for defraying the expenses of missionary labor performed during the year now ending. S. S. G., Clerk.

☞ Delegates coming by way of New York, will take the Stonington line of steamers, Battery Place, Pier No. 2 North River, at 5 o'clock P. M., on Fourth-day. Be sure and procure tickets for Mystic Bridge, instead of Stonington, as thereby you will save fifty cents each. On arriving at Stonington, at about 2 o'clock the next morning, stage coaches will bring you to Greenmanville—distance, about five miles. Delegates will request the drivers of the coaches to leave them at my house. In behalf of the Church at Greenmanville, a general attendance is requested.

S. S. GRISWOLD.

Central Railroad Company of New Jersey.

THE cars will run as follows until further notice, commmencing Monday, April 10, 1854:—

Leave New York at 8 A M, 12 M., and 4 and 6 P.M.

Leave Plainfield for New York at 7 and 8.30 A.M., 12.50 and 5.10 P.M., passenger, and 7.30 P.M., freight.

Leave Plainfield for Easton at 9.35 A.M., 1.40 and 3.35 P.M., passenger, and 6.30 A.M. freight; and for Somerville at 7.30 P.M.

Passengers will be required to purchase tickets before entering the cars, or pay five cents in addition to the regular fare.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order CHIMES of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes, in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations [illegible] its kind, it is an [illegible] composition of costly material. Still it is [illegible] to the public at a reasonably low price, [illegible] is of vastly more importance to them, its [illegible] never suffered to decline from its original [illegible] of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

Mankind.

Let us speak of a man as we find him,
And censure alone what we see;
And should a man blame, let's remind him
That from faults we are none of us free.
If the veil from the heart could be torn,
And the mind could be read on the brow,
There are many we'd pass by with scorn,
Whom we're loading with high honors now.

Let us speak of a man as we find him,
And heed not what others may say,
If he's frail, then a kind word would bind him
When harsh words would turn him away;
For the heart must be barren, indeed,
Where no seed of repentance can bloom;
Then pause, ere you censure with speed;
On a smile or a frown hangs his doom.

A Matrimonial Adventure.

A correspondent of the Congregationalist gives a narrative of a recent and singular adventure, in a letter from Iowa. He says:—

A young man connected with one of the evangelical congregations there, but not a member of the church, had engaged to marry a young lady belonging to a respectable Catholic family in the place. She, as was natural, when the appointed time for their union was near, intimated her wish that the ceremony might be performed by his Right Reverence, the "Bishop of Dubuque." Her lover expressed his willingness that it should be so, provided nothing should be required of him in connection with the marriage service, to which he could not conscientiously assent. He subsequently visited the Bishop, and asked to be made acquainted with the form of marriage used in the Catholic church, giving at the same time his reason for the request. The Bishop read to him the service appointed for the "sacrament" of matrimony; the young man finding nothing in it to which he could make serious objection, consented that the ceremony should be performed by the Bishop, and in the Catholic church. The day for the marriage having arrived, the bridegroom and bride, with the groomsman and bridesmaid, and their numerous friends, repaired to the church. The ceremony commenced; but had not proceeded far, when a manuscript was handed to the groom with the request that he would sign it. The expectation doubtless was, that he would sign without reading it. But he was not to be so caught. He read the paper, and found it to be a solemn obligation to train up his children, in case any should be given him, in the faith and order of the Catholic church, whereupon he refused to set his name to it. The Bishop informed him, that unless he should do so, the marriage could not take place. He then turned to his bride, and asked her if they "should henceforth be two?" She said "No!" He asked her if she would go to Galena, (some fifteen miles below,) and be married? She said "Yes." He then turned to the spectators present, and told them he regretted to disappoint them, but was compelled to do so, and immediately left the house, took a carriage and started for Galena. Having reached there, they applied to a Catholic priest for his services, and found that the Bishop had headed them off by a telegraphic dispatch, directing the priest at Galena not to marry them. The young man then asked the lady if she would be married by a Justice of the Peace? She answered in the affirmative, and straightway to a Justice's office they went, and the knot was tied—just as her brother rode up in hot haste to prevent, if he could, such a consummation. The Bishop was openly and loudly cursed in the streets, even by persons belonging to the Romish communion, for his course.

Anecdotes of the Fox.

The fox is of all animals the most cunning. In the nobler quality of sagacity, he is perhaps inferior to his relative, the dog, or to the elephant; but both of these must yield the palm to him in that peculiar trait which we call cunning. This is not always a bad quality, for it is frequently employed to defeat evil intentions, and oftener still for mere amusement; but it is seldom that cunning may be ranked with the virtues. We say of a man who resorts to all manner of tricks to secure his objects, that he is wily, or that he is "as cunning as a fox."

The fox is one of the most abundant of the four-footed animals. He is found in nearly every part of the globe, and wears coats of different colors in different localities. Sometimes he appears in a suit of glossy black; again he is found in a red coat, a yellow jacket, or a grey mantle; while in far northern regions, he dons a robe of white, as if he were the most innocent creature in the world.

He is not easily tamed, and hence there are not half so many entertaining stories told about him, as there are about more domestic animals. He loves his freedom too well, and is too fond of committing depredations among the poultry, to be content to be petted in the house. Nor would he be a very agreeable companion, although it must be allowed that he is not an ill-looking fellow with his soft, grey or reddish coat, his bright eye, and his bushy tail.

He is very rapacious, constantly seeking what he may devour, and seldom disdaining anything in the shape of fish, flesh, or fowl, which he can lay his paws on. He is fond of rabbits—epicure that he is!—and displays his cunning in the manner in which he takes them prisoners. Instead of entering the hole which leads to their burrowing-place, he saves himself the trouble of digging his way along, by scenting the track of the rabbit above the ground till he reaches the spot where it hides, when he digs down, and falls upon his victim suddenly.

The fox is very fond of grapes, and in the fables of Æsop there is a familiar story of one who came one day to a vine hanging full of delicious looking fruit. The fox made great exertions to reach them, but finding it impossible, he consoled himself by saying that they were miserable, sour things, and not worth having. It has become, from this fable, quite a proverb, when a thing is beyond our reach, to say, "the grapes are sour."

There is another story, of equal truth, told of this animal. One day a fox, who was distinguished among his fellows by the size of his "brush," (a name given by hunters to his bushy tail,) was so unfortunate as to fall into a trap, from which he contrived to escape, with a sad loss, however—the loss of his tail! The cunning rascal, while he was deploring his misfortune, conceived of a plan to make it turn out to his credit. He was an influential fox, and he resolved to try what eloquence could do among his fellows. So, after some days of concealment, he made his appearance among his tribe, and reported that he had been abroad, where, he said, the fashion was to wear no tails, and he earnestly counseled his brethren to adopt the same fashion as he had already done! But the cunning of one was not a match for the cunning of many, who loudly protested that they did not believe that their brother would do so, if he had not first lost his tail in a trap!

A naturalist relates that a fox lost one of his fore feet in a trap, and made his escape. Some two years afterward, he was unearthed by some dogs, but instead of running, as is usual with the hunted fox, he waited until each dog came up to him, and then jumped suddenly over them. When he was taken, after repeating this ruse several times, it was discovered that he had but three feet, and could not run well.

The same writer tells an anecdote of another fox who wanted very much to secure a hare for his breakfast. He says that he saw him stealing along the edge of a plantation, and looking very cautiously over the low wall at some hares which were feeding there. He was too cunning to give them chase, for he knew that they would escape him in flight; so he resolved to try stratagem. He stretched himself out at full length, close to a gap in the wall, which one or more of the hares might pass on leaving the field. His anxiety for a meal prompted him now and then to rise and have a peep over the fence; but most of the time he laid motionless, not even stirring when two or three hares left the field at another gap not many feet removed. At length two approached his place of ambush, and the fox crouched lower, and his ears quivered. As they passed the gap he sprang up like a flash of lightning, and seizing one of them, killed it immediately. He was making off boldly with his breakfast, when a rifle-ball suddenly put a stop to his course.

In a fox-chase which took place in Ireland, Reynard was hard pushed, and made for a high wall, over which he sprang, and crouched beneath it; and while the hounds which took the leap after him, dashed forward in full cry, he quietly leaped back again and made his escape.

In another Irish chase, the fox was so hotly pursued, that he sprang to the roof of a cabin, and mounting the stone chimney, looked calmly down upon the hounds. One of these, however, made after him, so resolutely, that Reynard had to plunge down the chimney to escape his clutches. He descended into the lap of an old woman, who thought the visitant came from quite an ill-famed quarter, and shrieking with affright, rushed into one corner of the hut, while the fox retreated to another. When the hunters came up and entered the cabin, they found the fox grinning at the woman, and they took him alive.

In the picture gallery of the New York Crystal Palace, there is a very amusing picture, called upon the catalogue, "The Fox and the Crow." It tells its own story, and serves to illustrate our theme. A fox is lying on his back apparently dead, his feet sticking up stiffly into the air, while two crows are approaching him. One of them is almost near enough to peck him; and we almost expect while looking at the cunning creature, to see him spring up and catch the unwary bird in his jaws. A good name for this picture would be "The Fox playing Possum."

Facts and Suggestions for Farmers.

From a report of the sayings and doings at a meeting of the Farmer's Club of the American Institute, on the 11th inst., we clip the following paragraphs:—

The French plant tomatoes with cucumber vines, which they think prevent the ravages of insects.

Mr. Meigs read a paper which stated the annual valuation of manure in England at $300,000,000, and upon this depends the whole country; for without manure the English farmers could not produce their immense crops.

Prof. Mapes gave the following formula for making grafting wax, an article required by every farmer at this season of the year: Take Canada balsam one pound, clean beeswax one pound, and boil together and knead into a putty consistency, or keep in a kettle, to be warmed as wanted for use, and put on with a brush. It is very convenient when spread thin upon cloth or paper, to be cut in strips for use, and its great advantage over any other meterial is that it will adhere to a wet surface.

Mr. Pell said that Indian corn yields a larger amount of farinaceous food to the acre than any other grain. It is the most certain crop ever planted. He plows in 50 loads of barnyard manure to the acre in November, and afterward subsoils, and in spring plows again, and plants in May. When the corn is five inches high, use the cultivator, but never hill up. He poisons crows and other troublesome animals. If he intends to sow oats in the spring he pulls up the stalks after picking the ear. He proved that topping corn reduced the weight of corn from 58 to 52 lbs. per bushel, and the crop in greater proportion. He has made 100 bushels of shelled corn per acre. He contends for feeding corn land with specific manures. He finds it advantageous always to sell his crop in the fall. His corn cost 30 cents a bushel to produce it. He thinks there is a great loss in going over a large space of ground—better make the same number of bushels usually made, upon one third of the space. He recommends sowing corn broadcast for fodder.

Prof. Mapes said he had a word to say upon making starch of Indian corn. Starch being insoluble in water, is easily separated from the gluten and precipitated. There is an immense starch manufactory at Oswego. The process is so perfect that the starch is rendered perfectly pure, and all that the corn contains is separated. The yield is near thirty pounds per bushel. In regard to the value of starch as a nutriment, Prof. M. thought we took already too much nutritious food, and that all grain is better used without separating its parts. Starch will not make as much fat as corn meal, though it is much used for food, and saves flour. It is also used in calico printing, not only as starch, but, by a chemical process, to make a sort of gum much required.

Mr. Greeley thought the increase of consumption of starch as food is very large, and that it is not beneficial—that however it may tickle the palate, a corn meal pudding is far better. He thinks that nine-tenths of the corn starch manufactured is used as food, and that, therefore, the business is more ornamental than useful.

One Cause of Insanity.

Indulgence in reading works of fiction is assigned by the intelligent physician of the Mount Hope Institution as one of the causes of insanity. He says:—

"Another fertile source of this species of derangement, has appeared to be an undue indulgence in the perusal of the numerous works of fiction with which the press is so prolific of late years, and which are sown broadcast over the land, with the effect of vitiating the taste and corrupting the morals of the young. Persons cannot too cautiously guard their young daughters against this pernicious practice. We have had several cases of moral insanity, for which no other cause can be assigned than excessive novel-reading. And nothing is more likely to induce this disease than the education which fosters sentiment instead of cherishing real feeling—such as results from the performance of active benevolence and the sacred duties of ordinary life, and of moral obligation—which wakens and strengthens the imagination without warming the heart; and, to borrow the language of an eloquent divine, places the individual 'upon a romantic theatre—not upon the dust of mortal life.'"

Twelve Golden Rules of Health.

A work on Homeopathy, recently issued, gives the following "Twelve Golden Rules" of health, embodying a code of hygiene which, though familiar in these days of instruction in the natural laws, can scarcely be repeated too often.

Rule I. Rise early, and make it a point to retire at ten o'clock; seven hours sleep should suffice; although less may do in some cases, and in others more may be required.

Rule II. Wash your whole body from head to foot, in cold water, every morning, winter and summer, immediately after leaving the bed; and rub yourself well with a flesh brush or coarse towel, immediately after washing.

Rule III. Never sleep in a warm room, or in a room that has not been properly ventilated in the day time.

Rule IV. Never sit or sleep in a draught of air; this rule is almost universally violated, but a draught of air is generally hurtful, more in one case than in another, and more especially when persons are over-heated or covered with perspiration.

Rule V. Dress according to the season; but be careful not to leave off your winter clothes before the warm weather has fairly set in. This rule should be particularly observed by persons who are subject to sore throat, bronchitis, chronic cough, and such like weaknesses.

Rule VI. Avoid all kinds of heavy and indigestible food, such as rich pastry, fat, heavy, farinaceous diet, warm bread, spices, mustard, pepper, &c.

Rule VII. Avoid all stimulating drinks, brandy, beer, wine, and content yourself with cold water, milk, light and unspiced chocolate, weak black tea, and syrups made of currants, raspberries, strawberries, or other kinds of wholesome and unmedicinal fruit. Never use tobacco in any shape, except for medicinal purposes.

Rule VIII. Never keep on wet or damp clothes, stockings, &c., and never sleep on damp sheets.

Rule IX. Do not expose yourself to keen, sharp winds, and avoid the raw and damp evening air.

Rule X. Live as nearly as possible in the same temperature; keep your room moderately warm, and make it a point never to sit near the fire.

Rule XI. Eat your meals at regular hours; eat slowly; chew every mouthful well, and do not swallow it until it is properly mixed up with saliva. If possible, take about an hour for each meal, and never eat so much as to leave the table with a sense of repletion and oppression; do not forget to clean your teeth with a soft tooth brush after eating, and never indulge in the abominable habit of picking them.

Rule XII. Avoid every kind of food or drink which naturally disagrees with you; take a little exercise in the open air every day, but not in any kind of weather; select particularly fine, bracing or balmy weather for a walk or ride; exposure to rainy, windy, raw or damp weather never does any body any good.

These twelve rules are golden rules, the observance of which can never be impressed with too much care upon the attention of those who are anxious to preserve their health, and to remain free from the many unpleasant feelings which are apt to trouble those who neglect the proper dietetic and hygiene precautions.

Remedy for the Potato-Rot.

Mr. A. Hogeboom writes to the N. Y. Tribune as follows:—

Permit me to state an experiment which I made for three successive years, obtaining each year corresponding results. It was simply this: Two square boxes, four feet each way, and two deep, were filled with very rich dirt, the dirt first being well mixed up, and then the boxes filled from it. The boxes were placed in a very warm situation; the one raised a few inches from the ground, and the other elevated two or three feet on upright sticks, which were kept well coated with tar during the season, and which had the effect of keeping the bugs from the box. Around the sides of the box was a sort of lattice work, to prevent the vines from dropping over the sides. Against the side of the other box was raised a bank, nearly level with the top of the box.

In each of these boxes were planted each year four hills of potatoes—the white pink-eyes. Four large potatoes were halved, each box receiving the half of each potato. During the season the potatoes in these boxes were kept well watered, receiving equal quantities of the fluid. The result was invariably this: The vines in the box from which the bugs have been excluded remained green till the frost came, exhibiting no symptoms of the blight. The potatoes, when dug, were large and perfectly sound, and so remained till the next summer. In the other box, where the vines were sometimes covered with the potatoe insects and bugs, the tops were dead by the first of August. When the potatoes were dug, those in the latter box were nearly all rotten, and not half the size of those in the other box. Will you explain this phenomena on any other principle than that of the insect theory?

To the farmer, I would say, procure those kinds of potatoes which have the greatest celebrity for resisting the ravages of the bugs. Don't plant in very rich or warm places. Plant early, and dig before the wet weather sets in, in the fall. And by all means keep the potatoes dry and warm, after they are taken out of the ground.

Speed on Railways.

Dr. Lardner adopts some ingenious arguments, or rather illustrations, to render familiar the extraordinary velocity with which our express trains move. The Great Western Express to Exeter, travels at the rate of 43 miles an hour, including stoppages, or 51 miles an hour without including stoppages. To attain this rate, a speed of sixty miles an hour is adopted midway between some of the stations; and in certain experimental trips 70 miles an hour have been reached. A speed of 70 miles an hour is about equivalent to 35 yards per second, 35 yards between two beats of a common clock; all objects near the eye of a passenger traveling at this rate will pass by the eye in the thirty-fifth part of a second; and if 35 stakes were erected at the side of the road, a yard asunder, they would not be distinguishable from one another; if painted red, they would appear collectively as a continuous flash of red color. If two trains with this speed passed each other, the relative velocity would be 70 yards per second; and if one of the trains were 70 yards long, it would flash by in a single second. Supposing the locomotive which draws such a train to have driving-wheels seven feet in diameter, these wheels will revolve five times in a second; the piston moves along the cylinder ten times in a second; the valve moves and the steam escapes ten times in a second—but as there are two cylinders, which act alternately, there are really twenty puffs or escapes of steam in a second. The locomotive can be heard to "cough" when moving slowly, the cough being occasioned by the abrupt emission of waste steam up the chimney; but twenty coughs per second cannot be separated by the ear, their individuality becoming lost. Such a locomotive speed is equal to nearly one-fourth of that of a cannon-ball; and the momentum of a whole train, moving at such a speed, would be nearly equivalent to the aggregate force of a number of cannon-balls, equal to one-fourth the weight of the train. That "smash" should follow a "collision" is no subject for marvel, if a train moving at such speed—or anything like such speed—should meet with any obstacle to its progress.

Give Me Drink.

Mr. McLeod, an English writer, puts the following language in the mouths of those who visit the rumseller's den:—

There's my money—give me drink! There's my clothing and my food—give me drink! There's the clothing, food, and fire of my wife and children—give me drink! There's the education of the family and the peace of the house—give me drink! There's the rent I have robbed from my landlord, fees I have robbed from the schoolmaster, and innumerable articles I have robbed from the shopkeeper—give me drink! Pour me out drink, for more I will yet pay for it! There's my health of body and peace of mind—there's my character as a man and my profession as a Christian—I give up all—give me drink! More yet I have to give! There's my heavenly inheritance and the eternal friendship of the redeemed—there, there, is all hope of salvation! I give up my Saviour! I give up my God! I resign all! All that is great, good and glorious in the universe, I resign forever, that I may be—DRUNK!

Railroads in Russia.

In all this monster empire, while the rest of Europe has been spinning its myriads of iron cobwebs from wall to wall, and from tower to tower, one line has been laid down, (I do not speak of Poland,) and that one line which was all but necessary, and which actually runs along one of the few lines of Russian intercourse for which a capital road had already been laid down. The undertaking was either a job, or a mere effort of vanity; probably both. But it will not be imitated. Railroads are not encouraged in Russia; they are considered as connected in some way with the revolutionary tendencies of the age, and are accordingly disfavored. As regards the transit of soldiery—the only point, of course, upon which it is worth the while of Russian authority to consider them—the matter has been pondered, and the Emperor finds that he can move his armies (their appurtenances taken into account) as advantageously without rails as with them. As to private enterprise here, that is entirely out of the question. Without pausing to ask whether you can expect railway progress in a country which leaves one of its most splendid and important ports undrained and unlighted, or where the nation's very almanac is left a laughing-stock to Europe, we shall find that a more practical, if not a more real, obstacle opposes itself to the establishment of railways, were they ever so much desired. There is no capital. The sinews of railway war are wanting. The money could not be found. In saying this, I am simply recording the answer made by tradesmen, by merchants, by proprietors, by natives, as well as foreigners, and even (in whispers) by daring officials, when questioned concerning the stagnation of all national and popular enterprise—"We have no money as a nation." I have received this answer a hundred times. Many Russians are rich, but Russia is poor. With this answer, of course, ceases my share in the question, as it appears to meet the inquiry which would occur to an Englishman on first considering the position of Odessa.

The Artificial Propagation of Salmon.

As several reports have been circulated in the newspapers, to the effect that the attempt to propagate salmon by artificial means in Ireland and elsewhere had extensively failed, we think it right to state that we have obtained some information from the very best sources, which convinces us that these reports are wholly unfounded. On the contrary, we are glad to say the success attending the first attempt at propagation on an extensive scale in the country has surpassed our most sanguine expectations. It is reported from Perth, where about 350,000 ova are nearly hatched, that everything has progressed most satisfactorily; the whole of the ova, with a trifling exception, seem in a lively state. The only difficulty appears to be, that of providing sufficient ponds for such a multitude of fishes when they are able to swim, as the feeding ponds already provided will not contain one-tenth of them; and such is the number that there appears no other way, after having hatched and protected them for twenty weeks, but that of committing them to the river to take their chance. At Galway about 260,000 ova are in a similar prosperous condition. Propagation on a smaller scale has also been carried into effect on the rivers Tweed, Louchard, the Foyle, Bush Mills, the Blackwater, the Moy, the Dee, near Chester, and other places. By the use of spring water the spawn has been entirely protected from injury by frost, during the past severe winter; and of 2,500 eggs which were sent from Galway to Basle, a distance of nearly 1,000 miles, M. Lex states that a considerable portion are good, and in a state likely to live.

GENIUS, TALENT, CLEVERNESS.—Genius rushes like a whirlwind; talent marches like a cavalcade of heavy men and horses; cleverness skims like a swallow in a summer evening, with a sharp, shrill note, and a sudden turning. The man of genius dwells with men and with nature; the man of talent in his study; but the clever man dances here, there, and everywhere, like a butterfly in a hurricane striking everything and enjoying nothing, but too light to be dashed to pieces. The man of talent will attack theories; the clever man assails the individual, and slanders private character. But the man of genius despises both; he heeds none, he fears none, he lives in himself, shrouded in the consciousness of his own strength, he interferes with none, and walks forth an example; "eagles fly alone, they are sheep that herd together." It is true, that should a poisonous worm cross his path, he may tread it under his foot; should a cur snarl at him, he may chastise it; but he will not, cannot attack the privacy of another. Clever men write verses, men of talent write prose, but the man of genius writes poety.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

In this connection, it becomes us in a proper spirit to ponder the account, and contemplate the dread scene of divine retribution which the prophet presents along with his prediction of the universal observance of the Sabbath in Millennial times. The testimony of God is, "And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." (Is. lxvi. 24.) How dreadful must be the sight! How fearful even to anticipate! It is not merely the certainty of future punishment of those who have so transgressed against the Lord, but the certainty that under the direful torment of the doom awaiting them, they shall be seen of all flesh. For it is not merely spiritual suffering that is here foretold; it is not the suffering of disembodied spirits in reflection on what in the flesh they did, or on what through sin they have lost. Their agony is not merely that of remorse for what they have rejected and what they have despised of the mercy of God in the day of His grace. In addition to all this, there is here set before us material torment. The transgressors have their bodies. Their bodies, indeed, only are mentioned—for the word in the original usually signifies the dead body. The circumstances under which it is here used imply, however, that it is not the insensible, but the reanimated body, that is meant. Otherwise, neither the undying worm nor the unquenchable fire could terrify or appal. It appears to be the very scene to which our Lord refers, when exhorting to a denial of the flesh; for, using the very words of the prophet, he says of those who miss the kingdom of God, and are "cast into hell-fire," that there "their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." (Mark ix. 47, 48.) It is the strongest expression used in Scripture descriptive of future punishment—of the punishment of soul and body reunited, as united they were when they transgressed against the Lord. We cannot indeed conceive of material bodies indestructible by fire, but neither can we conceive of the nature of the resurrection body of the redeemed. But the word of the Lord is true. Hath He said, and shall He not bring it to pass? He who made man as now he is, can also in the world to come fit the wicked for that which they are doomed to endure.

In the endurance of apportioned misery, these transgressors are not in a place of concealment, but exposed to view, and actually seen of men. Regularly, as from one New Moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, all flesh come to worship before the Lord, "they shall go forth and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed." Sweltering in the fire of divine wrath, and exposed to the gnawing of a worm that dieth not, "they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." They are made a beacon to warn men of their danger, should they transgress against the Lord. And so effective is the means to the end designed, that they are the universal abhorrence.

We do not, however, understand the statement as intimating the punishment of all the wicked as here implied. All are indeed transgressors; but looking at the connection, we are disposed to regard "the men who have transgressed" as those who have been preëminetly wicked; those who have not only accounted themselves unworthy of eternal life, but who have gloried in infidelity, and declared themselves the open adversaries of the living God. The scene described is Millennial, and takes place while the Lord is reigning visibly in His glory; and the transgressors referred to may be such as "make war with the Lamb, but the Lamb shall overcome them." In reference to the same period, when Michael shall stand up in behalf of Daniel's people, we read in the Book of that prophet, that "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." (Dan. xii. 1, 2.) The resurrection here predicted, although of both the righteous and the wicked, is not the resurrection of all. It embraces many, but still it is only "many of," or out of, "them that sleep." Others therefore are left "in the dust of the earth;" and these we infer will be wholly of those whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life—for all who sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him. But at that period "some" shall be "raised to shame and everlasting contempt." The language is quite in accordance with that of Isaiah; and, referring to the same period, may be regarded as applicable to the same class, aggravated transgressors in God's sight. The punishment to which these also are subjected, although it is not expressed, must also be obvious. To create shame and expose to contempt, their condition must be seen by others, and these, too, persons of a better spirit.

But, as concerning the righteous, it is written, "We shall not all die, but we shall all be changed;" and, "This mortal must put on immortality;" so also may it be that, besides the wicked dead who shall be raised to shame and contempt, there will be, also, those who shall go down alive to the pit of destruction. It is predicted of those who, in the last conflict of this dispensation, are opposed to Him who is like the Lamb of God and the Lion of the tribe of Judah, that, "the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshiped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone." (Rev. xix. 20.) That this means something else than that they were killed, is evident from the fact that death is foretold in contradistinction, as the portion of others of less aggravated transgression; it is thus immediately added, "And the remnant were slain with the sword of Him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of His mouth; and all the fowls were filled with their flesh." (ver. 21.) Illustration of this is supplied in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. "If," said Moses, "these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me. But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick (or alive) into the pit, then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord. And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them; and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them." (Numb. xvi. 29–33.) Whether "the pit" here, and in all other instances in which the original wood occurs, signifies no more than the grave, we will not positively speak; but there does seem in some instances reason to conclude that more is implied. And, looking at the statement quoted above relative to those who are to be "cast alive into a lake of fire" in the coming conflict, it seems not improbable that not only those raised from the dust of the earth to shame and everlasting contempt, but some in active and blasphemous rebellion against the Lord at his coming, may be included among those whose punishment in Millennial times shall be an abhoring to all flesh.

But the language of the prophet, intimating as it does the punishment of the wicked, soul and body, in the sight of mankind in the body, also implies a place of punishment, of which the fire shall not be quenched. If men upon the earth go forth to look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed, the place of their torment must be visible, from year to year, its fire being unquenchable. And, indeed, the use to be made of fire in the judgments of the latter day is remarkable. This prophet, Isaiah, contemplating the final conflict between the Redeemer who is called Wonderful, and the Wicked One, the Antichrist, exclaims, "For every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood; but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire." (Is. ix. 5.) And again, "The Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of "Zion, and shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the midst thereof, by the spirit of judgment, and by the spirit of burning." (Is. iv. 4.) So Daniel also, describing the judgment preceding the establishment of the Redeemer's Kingdom upon the earth, beheld in his vision, the ancient of days, and "His throne was like the fiery flame, and His wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him." "I beheld even till the beast was slain and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." (Dan. vii. 9, 11.) And in the corresponding statement by John, "And the ten horns which sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh and burn her with fire." (Rev. xvii. 16.) And the prophet Isaiah, speaking again of the Assyrian, the adversary of Israel and Israel's God in the last times, says "The Lord shall cause His glorious voice to be heard, and shall show the lighting down of His arm with the indignation of His anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire, with scattering, and tempest, and hailstones. For through the voice of the Lord shall the Assyrian be beaten down, which smote with a rod. And in every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the Lord shall lay upon him, it shall be with tabrets and harps; and in battles of shaking will he fight with it. For Tophet is ordained of old; yea, for the king it is prepared; He hath made it deep and large; the pile thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it." (Is. xxx. 30–33.) The Tophet here spoken of we understand as named merely in allusion only to the valley of Hinom; it is, however, in proof of the fiery character of the judgment of the latter day, that we make the citation. And even in the previous verses we have the same view presented; "Behold" the Name of the Lord cometh from far, burning with His anger, and the burden thereof is heavy; His lips are full of indignation, and His tongue as a devouring fire." (ver. 27.) The apostle Paul also testifies, that "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." (2 Thess. i. 7, 8.) And the apostle Peter, as we have seen, contrasts the manner of the destruction of the existing heavens and earth with that of the destruction of the heavens and the earth which were before the flood; that whereas "the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished," while the heavens and earth which are now, "are kept in store, reserved unto fire;" so that in the day of the Lord the very "elements shall melt with fervent heat." (2 Pet. iii. 5–11.)

Even places preëminently guilty and rebellious are to be burned with fire in that day. Speaking of the future judgment of Babylon he says, "Babylon, the glory of Kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldee's excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation." (Is. xiii. 19, 20.) Usually, indeed, this prediction is supposed to have had its fulfillment; but that it refers to the future appears evident from the manner in which the prophet connects with it, and as resulting from the overthrow foretold, the recall of Jacob, or the whole house of Israel, while the Ten Tribes have never yet been brought back since they were first carried captive. But, immediately following the account of the purposed desolation of Babylon from which we have quoted the prophet adds, "For the Lord will have mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land." (Is. xiv. 1.) The New Testament prophet, John, speaking in like manner, of the destruction of Babylon, says, "Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire; for strong is the Lord God that judgeth her." And those who have profited by her merchandize" shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning." "And cried when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city!" "And her smoke rose up for ever and ever." (Rev. xviii. 8, 9, 18; xix. 3.)

Dan. 11: 25, 26, 27—"And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army; and the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand; for they shall forecast devices against him. Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow, and many shall fall down slain. And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper, for yet the end shall be at the time appointed." "A time," 360 prophetic days, (in verse 24, 360 years,) began B. C. 31, and ended A. D. 329. Antony was sent into Egypt by the Romans on business, and becoming captivated by the charms and arts of Cleopatra, as Julius Cesar had been before him, his passions became so strong that he gave himself entirely to her and the Egyptian interests, and became virtually king of Egypt, and sent a letter to his wife in Rome, the sister of Octavius Cesar, divorcing her, and ordering her with her children to leave his house immediately. This, and other indignities, induced Octavius to declare war against Egypt, in order to be revenged on Antony. Cesar led forth the Roman power purposely to overthrow Egypt and make it a Roman province, it being the only portion of the Grecian world then independent of Rome. Julius Cesar had attempted its subjugation twenty years before, but failed; and now the whole power of Egypt, headed by Antony and Cleopatra, was exerted in defense, aided by several neighboring countries. The great battle was fought near Actium B. C. 31, Cesar was victorious, Egypt was ruined, and Rome triumphant stood forth a universal empire, and from that date continued united (strong as iron) for 360 years, when Rome (a strong hold) was deserted as the seat of the empire, transfering it to Constantinople, Nov. A. D. 329, where the seat of the empire became established A. D. 330.

"Yea, they that feed of the portion of his (king of Egypt's) meat shall destroy him." Four very singular circumstances gave to Cesar the conquest of Egypt: 1st, in the midst of the battle, when victory promised for Egypt, Cleopatra with sixty ships of the line fled; 2d, Antony's land army deserted to Cesar, having no leader, as Antony had fled after Cleopatra; 3d, the army under Scorpus, (whither Antony fled,) for protecting the frontier, declared for Cesar; 4th, Antony and Cleopatra fitted out from Alexandria for another engagement; but when they came in view of Cesar's flag, Cleopatra's admiral struck his flag and surrendered her whole fleet to Cesar, all of which was by her directions. "She shall not stand, neither be for him."

Verse 28—"Then shall he return into his land with great riches, and his heart against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits, and return to his own land." Augustus Cesar left Egypt and returned to Rome master of the world, and took with him the wealth of Egypt. It has been already noticed, that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Prince of the covenant, was put to death under the reign of Tiberius, the successor of Augustus. No other great exploit was executed during these 360 years, except the overthrow of Jerusalem and Judea; they only kept their tributaries in subjection. During this time, from A. D. 64 to A. D. 303, ten persecutions by the Cesars caused the death of three millions of the followers of Christ, and by banishment, &c., many millions more. What the heart of Rome was set to do, it did.

Verse 29—"At the time appointed he shall return and come towards the south; but it shall not be as the former, nor as the latter." At the time appointed, (end of 360 years,) he (king of Rome, or Roman power) shall return, and come towards the south, (not to the south, but to Constantinople,) but it shall not be as the former (into Egypt for conquest,) nor as the latter, (to destroy Jerusalem and root up the Jews.) But why did he return and come toward the south? Verse 30—"For the ships of Chittim shall come against him; therefore shall he be grieved, and return and have indignation against the holy covenant; so shall he do." The Emperor Constantine embraced the Christian faith, and decreed the Christian religion the religion of the empire; he forsook home, and left it a prey to the merciless hoards of barbarians, and established the seat of his empire at Constantinople, A. D. 330. In 476 these had possessed themselves properly so called. Rome was first invaded and sacked by the Goths under Alaric, A. D. 408; but they voluntarily retired from Rome in 412. By 429 the terrible Genseric, king of the Vandals, had become master of Africa, by the conquest of Carthage or Chittim (580 years after its destruction and the defeat of Hannibal by the Roman army under Scipio.) From 441 to 453 the Huns under Attilla invaded Rome. From about 430 to 470 the Vandals, under Genseric, ruined Rome by having command of the Mediterranean Sea, and thus approaching Rome and overcoming the Roman power by their navy. In 453, they entered Rome, pillaged it, and transported to Carthage every thing which they desired. This pillaging and loading their ships occupied fourteen days and nights. After this the whole Roman power for three years prepared themselves to dislodge Genseric from the Mediterranean, but Genseric destroyed the Roman ships and forces in one day. In 468 the Roman Emperor made a last effort to drive Genseric from the Mediterranean or destroy his fleet; 1113 ships and over 100,000 effective men were employed for this purpose, at a cost of about $30,000,000; but Genseric destroyed them in one day as before. Thus he (the Roman power or emperor) came still further towards the south; but not as formerly.

The barbarians continued to pollute Rome and invade the Roman empire till 538. Odoacer put an end to the Imperial Roman power in the west in 476. Constantine and the emperors after him at first adopted the true faith, and sought to the Bible, in which is contained the holy covenant of God to man for direction in all matters of faith and practice; but as the power and dominion of the barbarians increased, the emperors modeled the church government, rites, ceremonies and ordinances, so as to meet the views in part both of Pagans and Christians, and both parties were obliged to yield, as religion was established by law and maintained by the power of the empire. Thus the civil and military powers of the government were strengthened by the union of them to the church; and no person could hold an office in government unless he was a church-member. This was a remarkable "falling away" age of the church, (2 Thess. 2: 3—12.) The laws of the empire required obedience to the decisions of councils and the head of the church, so called, in all matters of faith and practice, although the Bible was not yet excluded. He had not yet forsaken the holy covenant, but he had indignation against it, because it guarantied freedom of opinion in the church, and on all religious subjects. Here commenced the progressive work of the civil power, which greatly accelerated the "falling away," and resulted in establishing supreme "the abomination which maketh desolate," and in driving the church of Christ into the wilderness of the Alps and Pyrenees, where she is nourished in her place 1260 years, during which time more than 50,000,000 fell victims to this persecuting abomination.

THE JEWS IN YEMEN.

According to the Jewish Intelligencer there are in Yemen (Arabia) from 30,000 to 35,000 Jews; 200 of them live in Aden, 10,000 in Sana, the Uzal of Scripture, 1,000 in Sada, 1,000 in Damara, the Hadoram of Scripture, 200 in Hadenesh-Sham (Diklah), 2,000 in the desert of Beda, and the rest of them live in the small towns and villages.

In Ha-dan esh-sham, being independent of the Iman of Sana, the Jews are comparatively well situated; they live in peace with their Mohammedan neighbors, whom they assist in war, and by whom they are protected in peace, against the violence of fanatics and robbers. The Jews are agriculturists, and possess fields and gardens, with the few exceptions of some mechanics. They are represented to be extremely ignorant and not strict in their religious observances, because bearing arms on the Sabbath; but this proves nothing.

The Jews in the desert of Beda, dwell in tents as the other Bedouin Arabs; are governed by their own Sheik, and go to war with other tribes. They also are represented to be very ignorant, and similar to their neighbors in customs and usages.

The Jews under the jurisdiction of the Imans of Sana, are governed most despotically and barbarously. No Jew ventures to wear a good garment, fearing to be suspected of being rich; for if it be found that a Jew possesses more than five dollars, he is robbed of all his property. They wear a coarse shirt and a long Arba Kanforth, which is washed but seldom; they are not permitted to ride on a horse or a mule, and in presence of a Mohammedan, also, not an ass. Therefore, they are not permitted to mount an ass in a city, and if traveling on ass-back, they must alight whenever meeting with a Mohammedan. It is reported, that when, last year, the Iman had no funds to pay his soldiers, he gave them permission to spoliate the Jews, whereby most of their books were destroyed, so that there is now a great want of Bibles among them.

It is reported of the Jews of Sana, that they are very pious, and there are many scholars among them. Their favorite literature, next to the Bible, is the Zohar. Most of them are hard-laboring mechanics, carpenters, brick-layers, blacksmiths, &c., and but a few of them are brokers on a small scale; but the latter live in the continual danger of being denounced, and robbed of their property. It is customary among them, to borrow money of a Mohammedan, even if it be not needed, and pay him part of the profit; so they transact business, as agents, and have a protector. It is supposed that they remain in that unhospitable land, on account of the low rate of provisions.

[Asmonean.

Margaret Fuller somewhere beautifully says:—"It is a marvel whence this perfect flower (the water-lily) derives its loveliness and perfume, springing as it does from the black mud over which the river sleeps, and where lurk the slimy eel and speckled frog, and the mud-turtle, whom continual washing cannot cleanse. It is the very same black mud out of which the yellow lily sucks its obscene life and noisome odor. Thus we see, too, in the world, that some persons assimilate only what is ugly and evil from the same moral circumstances which supply good and beautiful results—the fragrance of celestial flowers—to the daily life of others."

LET THE HEART BE BEAUTIFUL.

So the heart, the heart, is beautiful,
I care not for the face;
I ask not what the form may lack
Of dignity or grace;
If the mind be filled with glowing thoughts,
And the soul with sympathy,
What matter though the cheek be pale,
And the eye lack brilliancy.

Though the cheek, ~~the cheek, be beautiful,~~
It soon may lose its bloom,
And the lustre of the eye be quenched
In the darkness of the tomb;
But the glory of the mind will live,
Though the bloom of life depart;
And oh! the charm can never die,
Of a true and noble heart.

The lips that utter kindly thoughts
Have a beauty all their own—
For gentle words are sweeter far
Than music's softest tone;
And though the voice be harsh or shrill
That bids the oppressed go free,
And soothes the woes of the sorrowing one,
That voice is sweet to me.

AN ORIENTAL WEDDING.

Under date of Jerusalem, October 18, 1853, a daughter of Dr. Barclay furnishes for the Millennial Harbinger the following account of an Oriental Wedding at the house of the Bash-Castil, an officer who ranks next to the Pasha:—

On Saturday last, mother and myself repaired thither, accompanied by their servant, whom the harine sent for us, with a pressing invitation to attend the "Phantarea," (the gentlemen portion, as a matter of course, being excluded the honor of a like insight into the tabooed cloisters of these secluded beings.) After wending our way through a few dark archways, the servant halted at rather a loftier door than is usually seen in Eastern dwellings, and we were here met by half-a-dozen black slaves, who conducted us up several flights of gloomy stone steps, and through as many walled courts, into a spacious apartment, where a perfectly Arabian night entertainment soon presented itself. On the divan, which extended all around the room, were gracefully lolling about a hundred Turkish ladies, of the élite of Jerusalem, each one sipping at an exquisite little finjan of coffee or smoking a chibouque, gilded and mounted with amber mouth-pieces. Several dancing-women were moving in undulating, and, but for their trailing robes and trowsers, even graceful steps, in the middle of the floor, rattling little bells, placed on the forefinger and thumb of each hand, as they danced, while two or three more sat on a rug playing the tamborine, and a red morocco drum-like instrument, producing anything but music. On our entrance, each one politely saluted us in Oriental style, and we were again and again welcomed by the only daughter of the Bash-Castil, who, for having performed the meritorious act of a pilgrimage to Mecca, is looked up to with the most profound awe and respect, and is considered as a religious prodigy. Her dress I noticed as extremely chaste and simple, in contrast with the gorgeous costume and profusion of jewelry worn by the other. It consisted merely of white merino trowsers, and tunic spangled with small specks of gold, a light gauze turban, and the usual yellow slippers; her hands wanting the almost indispensable henna, with which those of the rest were dyed in curious and fantastic figures. We were not long seated before the everlasting finjan of piping-hot coffee was served, which we swallowed down philosophically, notwithstanding we knew, from sad experience, that a burnt tongue would be the inevitable consequence. The loud peal of the muerrim was soon heard calling "the faithful" to prayers, and several of the elderly ladies, after washing their hands and feet, immediately commenced their various bowings and kneelings, in the Mohammedan prayer; the dancing, singing, tamborine music, and clapping of hands, going on during the whole time. Prayers being over, a stool inlaid with pearl was set before us, on which was placed a large round copper tray, filled with a great variety of little salmagundi dishes, around which the "pilgrim," several of the ladies, and ourselves, squatted a la Turk, to partake, while the rest did full justice, no doubt, to other tables in an adjoining apartment. A napkin, fringed with gold, was handed to each, and we, being Franks, were allowed the luxury of a coarse wooden spoon. The others, sans knives, sans forks, and sans spoons, as a matter of course ate with their hands, and it was curious, to say the least of it, to see their jeweled and henna-dyed fingers dabbling into a greasy dish of rice, and, with the greatest nonchalance, cramming their mouths to an extent almost incredible! The dishes, notwithstanding their excessive richness, were quite palatable; one consisting of paste, composed of gum arabic, sugar, and a variety of nuts, was extremely pleasant. Another rich repast was served, when the muerrim again cried at 4 o'clock P. M., after which I noticed each one equipping herself in her white sheet and yellow boots, and on inquiring the reason of such a bustle, found that they were all going in a procession to Neli Dand, the residence of the bride, to conduct her from thence, by torch-light, back to the dwelling of her future husband; one of the ladies offering to lead me by the hand the whole way, if I would only accompany them; to which kind proposition I readily assented, and soon found myself in the midst of a long string of ghostly white sheets, winding through the innumerable dark alleys and archways of the Jewish quarter. The Pilgrim, being in delicate health, rode a horse splendidly caprisoned, and led the train. Neli Dand, (the tomb of David, which is just outside of Zion gate,) was at last reached by the procession, and we were conducted into a large upper apartment, where, on a raised throne, the bride sat like a statue, completely enveloped in a large red sheet. An altar with silver censers, fuming with incense, and tall candlesticks, ornamented with gilt leaves, stood in front of her, while a sheathed sword hung over her head.

Soon after we entered, coffee, chibouques and sherbet, were handed, and we were sprinkled with rose-water, and fumed with incense. The women kept up a constant clapping of hands, and shrill singing, or rather screaming, about the "arroos," (bride,) until dark, when, fortunately for my aching head, at the approach of thirty or forty of their lords and masters, they ceased. In the midst of this train the bridegroom walked, under a canopy, accompanied by torch-bearers, and a fantastically dressed clown. On their arrival, the little groom was led up stairs to the bride, whose veil he raised, and suddenly extinguished the only lighted candle, afterwards making a mock endeavor to re-light it. In total darkness, the whole company, bride, groom and all, rushed down stairs. The little pair were placed under the canopy, the torches were lighted, and amid the shrill screaming of the women, the beating of the tamborine, and a large kind of tom-tom instrument, accompanied by the blowing of a loud whistle, the procession again moved on, the torch-bearers and clown leading a long string of turbans, and the canopy next, two or three hundred white sheets following on behind. At last they halted at the door of the Bash-Castil's house. The bride and groom were conducted into separate apartments, where each was gorgeously attired. The bride in a perfect blaze of gold and jewels, and cloth of gold, with a gilded mitre placed on her head, covered with diamond stars and crescents. Her hands, face and feet, which before had been dyed with henna, were stuck over in curious figures, with gold foil; her eyebrows and eyelids stained with kohl, and a gauze veil, spangled with gold, thrown over the whole. She was then set on a raised throne, her hands placed on her knees, her eyes closed, cautioned not to move, while a slave held a drawn sword over her head. She was a little wax-doll-like creature, of ten years of age, and, rigged up as she was, looking as much unlike a human being as possible. The little groom, (twelve years of age,) was, in the meantime, equipped in royal purple and ermine, and with his eyes also closed, placed on a small wooden throne, at the upper end of a spacious court, over which a large tent was erected for the occasion. One or two women danced before him, with a tall wax candle in each hand, while a few crusts of bread were burned under his nose. The bride was now conducted to the middle of the court, two attendants supporting her train, a slave bearing the sword before her, and she bowing her head slowly from side to side, holding her hands before her face. Here the groom met her, again drew aside her veil, and the august little pair were together led back to the throne.

The "pilgrim" made way through the crowd, with a chair, and placed it directly in front of the little couple for me to sketch them, exclaiming to the people to make way for the "lint el Hakim!" (daughter of the doctor.) During all these quaint and unmeaning ceremonies, the women kept up a constant clapping of hands, beating of tamborines, and loud, shrill screaming, about the "arroos and arrees," (bride and groom,) whose noisy nuptials we now had the extreme satisfaction of hearing, were completed. Suffice is to say, that with a slight headache and terrific roaring in the ears, we returned home, about 9 o'clock at night, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of the ladies to remain all night, and partake of two or three more suppers.

At a Jewish wedding I attended some time since, the ceremonies were quite similar, too, but much more unmeaning and complex than these. The little Jewish couple, (the groom about thirteen years of age, and the bride eleven, sat under a canopy of brocaded gold, and on a much loftier and more splendid throne than that of the Turkish pair, and the little groom, in lieu of extinguishing a light, dashed to pieces a goblet of wine at his feet. The ceremonies of these Oriental weddings, although sadly altered, still remind one very much of those spoken of in the Bible.

PAUL'S ESCAPE AT DAMASCUS.

In Acts 9: 24, 25, we read that the Jews at Damascus sought to kill Paul, and "watched the gates day and night" for that purpose; but "the disciples took him by night and let him down through the wall in a basket." In 2 Cor. 11: 33, the Apostle says that he "was let down in a basket through a window through the wall." How do these two expressions stand related to each other? The common view is, that the house where Paul was secreted was built on the wall, with a window overhanging it; so that he could be said, as in the Acts, to have been let down "through the wall," without any reference to the house, or as in Corinthians, to have been let down "through a window through the wall." Compare Joshua 2: 15, and 1 Sam. 19: 20. I saw houses built in this manner on the walls, in some of the eastern cities.

But there is room for another explanation. A few steps to the left of Babes-Shurkeh, the gate on the east side of Damascus, I observed two or three windows in the external face of the wall, opening into houses on the inside of the city. If Paul was let down through such a window, (which belongs equally to the house and the wall,) it would be still more exact to interchange the two expressions; that is, we could say, as in the Acts, that he escaped "through the wall," or as in the Epistle, that he escaped "through a window through the wall." As I stood with a friend who resided at Damascus, looking at the place referred to, a couple of men came to the top of the wall with a broad, flat basket, full of rubbish, which they emptied over the wall. "Such a basket," said my friend, "the people use here for almost every sort of thing. If they are digging a well, and wish to send a man down into it, they put him into such a basket; and that those who aided Paul's escape should have used a basket for the purpose, was entirely natural according to the present customs of the country. Judging from what is done now, it is the only sort of vehicle of which men would be apt to think under such circumstances." Pilgrims are admitted into the monastery at Mount Sinai in a similar manner. A rope, with a basket attached to it, is let down from a window or door, about thirty feet from the ground. Those who are to ascend, seat themselves, one after another, in this basket, and are thus drawn up by means of a pulley of windlass, turned by those in the convent. [Prof. Hackett in Ch. Review.

COMMUNION AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

In our reading in the Acts of the Apostles and their epistles, we find no established order of Christians, but such as were first known as disciples, and were afterwards called Christians. There were no sectarian divisions among them, or tolerated by them. They allowed of no immoralities in the church, nor permitted any disorderly persons to continue among them, but endeavored to keep themselves pure. And the apostles have given instructions how the churches shall conduct themselves when any of their members shall depart from the faith delivered to them, or be guilty of immoralities.

In 1 Cor. 5: 11, St. Paul says, "If any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such an one not to eat." He had been informed that there was a case of gross fornication in the Corinthian church, and he told them to put the guilty person away from among them, and not to eat with him. It is evident that while he was retained in the church, and they ate mutually together, the whole church would be partakers in his sin. It would be having fellowship with an unfruitful work of darkness, which they were bound to reprove. In this apostolic instruction, the case of the incestuous is not alone noticed. The covetous, the extortioner, and the railer, are alike prohibited, with the fornicator, the idolater, and the drunkard. How can we be assured that we are not doing contrary to this instruction, if we are to take no pains to ascertain the moral condition of those with whom we eat—especially if there be a promiscuous communion of all who may be inclined to eat with us? It may be said, that we are not certain that the apostle referred to eating at the Lord's table. But if a common meal is only intended, the restriction is still more rigid; for if this was not to be indulged, a religious eating, we may be assured, would not be allowed; but common eating could not have been intended, for even Christ ate with publicans and sinners. From this it is evidently seen, that there is a fellowship expressed for those with whom we eat at the Lord's table, and at least a connivance at whatever wrong or sin we may have reason to believe they are guilty.

Again, the same apostle says, 2 Thess. 3: 6, "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received from us." To withdraw from a brother can mean no less than to withhold from having religious intercourse with him, and of course not to eat religiously with him; and we are commanded to do this to every brother that walks disorderly, and not after the tradition, i. e. oral instruction, received from the apostles. The question then may arise, as to what is intended by walking disorderly? A disorderly citizen is one who disturbs the peace of the community by unlawful and riotous conduct. A disorderly church member is one who disregards the laws of God, and neglects or refuses to comply with the duties of Christianity. Now, our fathers, and many of us, have withdrawn from other religious societies from a persuasion that they were not walking according to gospel order. We have considered it contrary to the law of God, and apostolical instruction, to substitute sprinkling for immersion in the rite of baptism—to substitute an unconscious infant for an adult believer in Christ—to violate the law of God by putting in the place of the Sabbath the day called Sunday, and to deny the authority of the fourth commandment of the Decalogue. All these, and many other things, were done by the Papists. These things were disorderly and sinful, many centuries ago. And are they not so now? Neither gospel order nor apostolic tradition has changed by the action of time. That which was wrong when these defections took place, is equally so now. Is there a pious Sabbath-keeper among us who does not place these objectionable things among the unfruitful works of darkness, which we are forbidden to have fellowship with, and enjoined to reprove? See Eph. 5: 11. Now, if we are not to concern ourselves about the honesty, sincerity, and motives of our brethren who do such things, we must rebuke and reprove them as willful sinners; for sin is the transgression of the law. 1 John 3: 4. But I claim that it is our privilege and duty to know something concerning our brother's uprightness or defection of heart in these things. If he designs to disobey God in these objectionable things, I should be obliged to look upon him as God's open enemy. But if otherwise, and I am satisfied that he acts under a mistaken apprehension of the will of God, I can then love him as an erring brother, and kindly rebuke him.

But how shall this be done? My objections to his course would not be entertained by the church of which he is a member; for its constitution and articles of faith justify him. If I commune with him, I disobey the apostolic command, not to eat with him; and disregard his instruction from him to withdraw, as from one who walks disorderly. And I thereby tell him, in a way that he cannot fail to understand, that my objections against him are too trifling to prevent the most solemn act of Christian union. An intercommunion among First-day Pedobaptist churches may be held without these objections; for they mutually approve of those things to which we object. And First-day Baptists would have one less difficulty to surmount in communing with Pedobaptists; for with such their only objection relates to baptism, and perhaps, in some cases, to what they may consider their unscriptural organization and government. But Seventh-day Baptists must first abandon their strict construction of the fourth commandment, and their opinion of the ordinance of baptism, before they can consistently go into the practice of unrestricted communion.

Another difficulty our churches would meet with on the ground of such communion, relates to their discipline. If a member of any church in the connection shall abandon the observance of the Sabbath for that of the first day of the week, or for no day at all, he becomes, according to our discipline, a subject of censure; and, if he persist in his fault, of exclusion; because he neglects to hear the church. Matt. 18: 17. But no church observing the first day would refuse him membership on this account. Such churches do not so respect our discipline as to refuse a member, rejected from one of our churches for an offense which they would consider praiseworthy. It is well known, that the final and sum total of censure for wrongs committed by our members is included in withdrawing from them the hand of fellowship, and communion at the Lord's table. But what would all this avail upon the principle of unrestricted communion? A mere farce, amounting to nothing, for the discipline of the church would thus be effectually counteracted.

Again, to come to the Lord's table with any church, is, to all intents and purposes, to become a member of that church for the time being. Whatever their rules for the celebration of the ordinance may be, we acknowledge and submit thereto. And this is generally so understood by such churches; insomuch, that although they may willingly admit members of other denominations to their communion, and even charge them with a want of charity for refusing, their members seldom are willing to exchange this courtesy; because, say they, 'We cannot acknowledge the legitimacy of your organization;' or, 'We disapprove of the posture in which your church receive the elements of the communion;' or, 'We cannot approve of your communion service.' Such objections are made by such as are theoretically free communionists; and yet they are allowed to prevent their being practically so; showing hereby, that they are governed in their practice by the same principle which we advocate. And if we cannot consistently become permanent members of such churches, on account of their disagreement with us in some of the doctrines and duties of religion, it must be inconsistent for us to become temporarily so, for the purpose of holding communion with them.

LANGUAGE INDICATIVE OF CHARACTER.

Various are the ways by which Deity permits us to manifest our spiritual natures to others, and equally various are the means by which we, in turn, are permitted to read the spiritual characteristics of our fellow men. Amid a general uniformity, there is an endless variety in the manifestations of humanity. There are not only generic characteristics, distinguishing man from all other creatures, but there are also specific differences, separating races and nations, likewise individual distinctions between man and man. This diversity leads to diversity of thought, feeling, and action. Again, the same individual differs with age and circumstances. In youth, he is continually effervescing with joyousness and activity. In manhood, his blood stirs nobly, yet regular and energetic. In old age, his thoughts sit dolting in the dilapidated cells of thought.

Passing over other methods of manifesting and interpreting mind, notice, if you please, the modifications and development of character indicated in some of the phenomena of Language. Language is rather a result than a cause—rather an exponent of characteristics than a cause of characteristics. It is true, that like all other effects, while it is not the primary moving cause, it may form a connecting link in a cycle of causes and effects. Being thus an effect, an exponent, language becomes a most apt medium for the determination of causes or characteristics. The language of man is affected by physical and by mental causes. Hence a diversity in these produces diversity in language. Granting the diversity to have originated miraculously; yet, climate, natural scenery, modes of life, and habits of thought, are sufficient to account for many of the minor diversities and peculiarities of languages. Languages are ranged into three grand classes; these classes are divided into many families; these into many more subdivisions or dialects, forming in the whole a very great variety. Examining these varieties, you will find that each has certain characteristics distinguishing it from the others—characteristics corresponding, in a great measure, to the characteristics of the people speaking the language. The people, in turn, are affected by their country, its scenery, climate—by their modes of life, thinking, speaking, and the like.

For example, it is well known to every classic student, that the Greeks were emphatically children of nature. They smiled with the sun, wept with the showers, sighed with the breeze. They laughed when nature laughed, mourned when nature mourned. Their school-houses were the groves—their places of assembling for debate and oratory, had no roofing, save the clear blue sky—surrounded by no pillars, save beetling mountains. Their language partakes of their clime and country—mild, rich, rolling, sonorous, and full. The Romans were more warlike, active, aggressive, bold and independent, and their language partakes of like qualities. Their effeminate descendants, the Italians, are a people, polished, easy, and versatile, spending their days basking in sunshine and poetry, with souls alive to the beautiful in nature and art. They speak a language that is smooth, flowing, and liquid.

Pass, now, to mountainous Switzerland, from whose Alpine peaks liberty has sounded her clarion for ages unmolested—where freedom has looked down from her fastnesses upon surrounding nations, convulsed with contentions and vain struggles for liberty. You find her a people with the remains of a language adapted to quick, free, spirited, impassioned thought. Perhaps there is no better illustration of this than in the names of ancient places, which have remained unchanged through the mutations of time. Homer gives us such Grecian names as the following: Aulis, Heleon, Haliartus, Platea, Caledon, Pluron, Thespia, and Olizon—all emblematic of Grecian language and character. The Italians prefer such soft flowing names as Ravena, Loretto, Modena, Larissa, Salerno, Sienna, and Avlona. The Swiss represent their character and their mountain crags by such names as Actorf, Friburg, Staurz, Spiez, Thur, Zurich, and Ilanz.

The language of the Germans, abounding in consonants and aspirates, yet flexible and remarkably well adapted to versification—copious, inflected, possessing great facility in compounding words, and inverted in its structure, is just such a language as would naturally be constructed by a people whose learned men can sit, smoke, quaff hard cider and small beer, and chase Greek particles or metaphysical ideas, sixteen hours per day, for thirty or forty years in succession.

Turn next to Scotland, whose every highland peak, crag, and steep, has echoed with religious and political liberty—though smouldering now beneath the weight of opposing circumstances. The fire of Scotch enthusiasm kindles and burns wherever it goes. What names are better adapted to mountain sound, song, and enthusiasm, than such as Morven, Ullin, Malmor, Cromla, Fingal, Lubar, Swaran, and Tura?

Pass thence to our own country, and examine like characteristics. As we are, at present, looking for characteristics in names alone, turn to that people who have fled from the scourge of the white man, leaving no monument behind them, save now and then a name of a river, lake, or mountain. What speak these symbols of character? In the New England States, such names as Massachusetts, Connecticut, Narragansett, Pawcatuck, Seaconet, Wachuset, Monadnoc, Penobscot, Schoodic, Millinocket. Who could not judge very accurately from such names of the character of those who gave them—of the country which they inhabited—and of the traits it would tend to develop in those who might hereafter inhabit it? They are rugged, uneuphonic, barren, granitic in sound.

As we pass westward, we find a change of names—a change admirably adapted to express the change of country. For a country with a delightfully rolling surface—majestic in vale and hill—beautiful in rivers, and a picturesque lake scenery—we find names creating, by their majestic roll and swell, by their harmony of liquids and vowels, emotions similar to those excited by the visible objects which they represent. What names, for instance, more expressive than those used to represent the rolling, deep-toned Niagara—the shallow, fitful, yet beautiful Erie—the broad, expansive Ontario—the picturesque and enchanting Canandaigua, Seneca, Cayuga, Owasco, Skeneatelas, and Chautauqua. So with her places and rivers—Oswego, Genesee, Susquehanna, Allegany, Chemung, Onondaga, Otsego, Saratoga, Tonawanda, Tioga, and Ticonderoga.

In going into the broad valley of the Mississippi, we lose the majestic roll from the country—we lose it, too, from the Indian names of places. They subside into the placid, expansive, mellifluous flow, resembling the sea-like swell of the prairies, decked with their exuberant carpet of grass and flowers. Listen to the delicious softness of such names as Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Milwaukee, Ohio, and Mississippi. In going down into the sunny, lassitude-producing South, we find names partaking of ease in pronunciation, and perhaps effeminacy. *

THE VOLUME OF SERMONS.

Having been appointed by the Publishing Society one of a Committee to obtain original written sermons from the different ministers in the denomination, for the purpose of compiling a book of sermons for family reading, I corresponded with a number of our ministering brethren on the subject, and some of them gave encouragement of aiding by their contributions. Two years have passed by, and only a few have furnished productions. The Board have requested me to continue my efforts. I would therefore ask my brethren, each of them, if they intend to furnish one or more written original sermons for such a book, to send soon. W. B. GILLETT.

Rev. Joseph Chester, of Ironton, O., lately received at a donation-visit, a deed of the ground on which his house stands, worth $365; a receipt for his debts, $143; cash $105; books, clothing, &c., $100. Total, $713.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

It is always a mournful satisfaction, when a friend or acquaintance dies, to know it, and be assured that he has died in peace with God. To meet this universal wish, friends catch every sign which can be construed into evidence of reconciliation to God, and upon it base a hope that all is well with them. Frequently a simple expression, among a thousand of a different character, is all that can be gleaned from which to hope; and yet this is deemed sufficient. Sometimes we have a pattern of unsullied piety—a life of charity and Christian benevolence—an example of rare devotion, set before us as the true characteristics of the life and history of one who has just gone to the spirit world. Such records are most refreshing to the hearts of friends. The universal joy at such an announcement, is abated only in the circle of acquaintances, where perhaps for the first time they receive an intimation that the deceased possessed such rare qualities, and wonder they never knew it before. They turn to the conference and prayer room for evidence of their devotions, and find them not. They turn to the social circle for the proof of their Christian conversation, and tax their memories to point the time and place when they talked of personal holiness and God, or exhorted to faithfulness and duty, and find no response. They look for deeds of Christian benevolence, and find only the natural sympathies of humanity. They look for the fruits of their labors in the church, and see them not. Alas! a close scrutiny of their lives leaves them still more at a loss for the evidences on which such a model Christian character has been based as is so touchingly expressed in the "obituary."

However grateful such notices may be to friends, it is rare that they serve a useful purpose. The cold, inactive professor, wonders where the difference is between himself and the departed, and is satisfied to remain inactive still, assured his piety will be praised when he is gone. The impenitent sinner is lulled into greater security when those who have lived and acted much like him are so glorified when they die. There should be a clear agreement in the record and the life. No fulsome praise is needed by the dead, and it does no good to the living. The record should be just and true, or not at all. J. B.

RELIGIOUS AND CIVIL RIGHTS OF THE JEWS.—The movement to secure the rights of civil and religious worship to American citizens abroad, is peculiarly interesting to the Jews. Senator Cass has taken an active part in it, and presented many petitions to Congress on the subject. From something dropped in one of his speeches, the Jews inferred that his efforts were confined to Christians, and therefore addressed him a letter on that point; in answer to which he says: "I desire to procure those rights for a Catholic in a Protestant, and for a Protestant in a Catholic country, and for a Jew in all countries." In accordance with his suggestion, the Jews have prepared and are circulating the following petition:—

To the Honorable, the Senate of the United States:—

The petition of the undersigned respectful shows: That they are Citizens of the United States professing the Jewish religion, and that their brethren in faith and fellow citizens, are often necessarily absent in foreign lands. That when so absent, they are, in very many instances, deprived of most of their civil and religious rights, while the citizens and subjects of the lands thus intolerant, enjoy under our laws equal privileges with our citizens.

Your petitioners therefore pray, that the attention of Goverment may be directed to this want of reciprocity in the rights accorded to foreigners among us, and those extended to our citizens in other countries, and that in its wisdom it will endeavor to obtain for every American citizen abroad, of every creed, a just degree of civil and religious freedom.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

PASSPORTS TO HEAVEN.—In Russia, the passport system is carried out more thoroughly, probably, than in any other part of the world. Indeed, so completely has it become inwrought among the people, that they consider passports necessary, not in this world only, but also in the next, as appears by the following paragraph from a recent work on Russia:

"When the battle of life is fought, and its dead soldier brought into the house of God, that the last rites may be performed over the body, watch the process. After certain ceremonies of an imposing character, the priest approaches the coffin, which is open, and strews incense upon the breast of the dead. He then reads a paper, unfastens the front of the dress of the corpse, and places the document in the bosom. The interment then proceeds. That document is a certificate and passport, without which (duly vised by the priest) the officer in charge of the gate of heaven would refuse entrance to the soul of the departed. Even St. Peter demands the sight of a soul's papers. What objection can a worshiper of St. Peter make to such a system? He must, on the contrary, rather regard the renewing of his billet de sejour as a species of religious ceremony, and look upon the police officials as resembling his own priests—a point in which he will not greatly slander either party, both being, very generally, remarkably venal, dissolute, and worthless.

DEATH FOR BLASPHEMY.—A letter from Mosul, extracts of which are published in the Hebrew Observer, London, says that a Jewish Rabbi there is "now under sentence of death for having blasphemed the Jewish religion." The offense was committed some four years ago, but the offender has been allowed to go undisturbed until quite recently. The man awaits orders from the capital for his execution. Meanwhile, the Jews are endeavoring to secure the interposition of the British Government in his favor.

BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSIONS.—The receipts of the Baptist Missionary Union in the month of March, the last month of the financial year, were $53,289 75. Of the receipts and expenditures during the year ending with March, the Home Secretary gives the following account:—

1. The expenditures of the year ending with March prove to be nearly one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred dollars, and the receipts, from all sources, to be a fraction less than one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars—showing that the outlay of the year has exceeded its receipts by about NINE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED dollars. 2. That while this deficiency is not such a result as could be desired, there is nothing in it to discourage any real friend of the missionary work. The receipts, from all sources, have been more, by several thousand dollars, than in the preceding year, and the gifts of living contributors, the truest index of popular regard, have been more by nearly twelve thousand dollars than in the year preceding. But the expenditure of the year has been more than was expected at the time the last published estimate was made, and the income from coördinate societies and legacies has been less by ten thousand five hundred dollars than in the year ending with March, 1853. Living donors have made a greater advance in their contributions the past year than in any previous year since the reörganization of the Triennial Convention; and had the avails of legacies and the grants of kindred societies been equal to those of the preceding year, the whole expenditure would have been more than met by its receipts. But such was not the case, and the result is a deficiency of about nine thousand five hundred dollars. These are the facts.

CHINESE PRAYER MEETINGS.—The Rev. Mr. Speer, at San Francisco, in writing to the Board of Missions in reference to his ministry among the Chinese in that city, gives the following account of the Wednesday evening prayer meetings:—

"On Wednesday evening we have had frequently social prayer meetings in the Chinese language, and at present have regular family worship at nine o'clock in the morning. On these occasions the prayers made by the Chinese church members are often spiritual and edifying, indicating a clear comprehension of the Scripture system of redemption, and a careful and minute study of the word of God. Our habit is to read an appropriate chapter, and call on some of those present to lead in prayer, accompanying our exercises with singing also, in which two or three are quite proficient, and for which they have some taste. It is doutful whether the shrill, artificial screeching of the Chinese ever can be adapted to Christian hymns. Our music consists wholly of the well-known tunes of our American churches. To hear sounds so foreign and strange, coming from lips so long idolatrous, embodying the worship of the living God, will often bring tears of thankfulness into the eyes of Christians; and some have expressed great satisfaction from attending services of which they understood only the spirit and object."

UNLICENSED RUMSELLING.—On the 15th of April, just before adjournment, the Legislature of New York passed an Act to authorize others than Overseers of the Poor to prosecute for violations of the Excise Law. In places where the friends of temperance are disposed to enforce it, this law may be made to nearly annihilate the illegal liquor traffic. The Act reads as follows:—

SECTION 1. In case the Overseer of the Poor shall neglect for ten days to prosecute for any penalty provided by title nine, part first, chapter twenty, of the Revised Statutes, any other person, being a resident of the same County, may prosecute therefor, in the name of such officer or otherwise, by giving security to the Court or officer before whom he prosecutes, for the payment of all costs if he shall fail to recover judgment; and in such case, if prosecuted to effect, the penalty shall be collected and applied as now provided by law.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect immediately.

INFLUENCE OF FAMILY WORSHIP.—The late Dr. Hyde, of Lee, one of the most eminent ministers of his day, in a letter to a son, thus speaks of the influence of family prayer in promoting filial subordination:—

"It was my duty to impress on the minds of my children a spirit of subordination, and to be known as the head of the family. I never kept a rod in my house, yet I would have my children obey me. I presume you have no recollection of my ever correcting you, but you were taught to mind me early, before you had numbered two years. In guiding my children, I was greatly assisted by the daily return of the morning and evening sacrifice, which you never knew me to omit. In this service you ought to engage, if you mean to have a well-regulated family."

BIBLES PROHIBITED.—The Archbishop of Mexico has addressed to all the clergy a circular, in which he recommends to them the greatest vigilance in preventing the circulation and reading of Protestant Bibles, which are being introduced from the United States in Tamaulipas, across the Texan frontier. The Archbishop says that he has received personal information from the Minister of Justice, that measures have already been taken by the government to prevent the introduction of the Bibles and other books, and the operations of the agents alluded to, by whom the Bible Society is said to work.

Members in full connection,	31,816
Members in probation,	5,515
Total	37,331
Amount of Missionary money raised,	$13,235 44
Amount raised for the Am. Bible Society,	8,260 40
Amount raised for M. E. S. School Union,	1,345 92
Amount raised for M. E. Tract Society,	2,506 48
Total	$25,348 24

"SABBATH CONVENTION."—A North-Western Sabbath Convention (so called) is to be held at Chicago, Ill., on the 17th day of May. The call includes "the friends of the Lord's day throughout the North-West, of all denominations." But in the light of past experience, we venture to say, that no place will be found there for a friend and observer of the Bible Sabbath—the seventh day of the week—the day which in the Fourth Commandment is called "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," and which the Lord himself, through his prophets, calls "my Sabbath" and "my holy day." The Convention is evidently designed to include only those who, in defiance of Scripture and history, persist in identifying the Sabbath and the Lord's day, and representing them as one and the same institution, instead of treating the Lord's day as a mere popish festival, like Good Friday and Holy Thursday. O that the loud denouncers of Popery in the West, would cease to be its most effective supporters, as they certainly are, by observing in place of the Sabbath what they presume to call the Lord's day.

STATISTICS OF BENEVOLENCE.—The fiscal year, with most of the benevolent societies centering in New York, has just expired. From the accounts thus far made up, it appears that their operations the present year have been larger than ever before. The American Tract Society received this year, from sales and donations, $414,159, against $384,627 last year. American Bible Society $395,000 against $346,542. American Board, eight months, $191,201 against $186,682. American Home Mission Society, $191,209 against $171,734. American and Foreign Bible Society $44,000 against $44,811, besides $50,000 received for the new Bible House. Female Guardian Society $22,000 against $12,772.

THE LIQUOR LAW IN NEW YORK.—The Governor of New York, in vetoing the bill passed by the Legislature for the suppression of intemperance, felt called upon to give his reasons at length for so doing. This document has been responded to by the majority of the Legislature, through whose influence the bill was passed. The two papers, taken together, contain the gist of the argument on that point, and make a good temperance document for general circulation.

SABBATH LECTURES.—Last Sabbath evening, Eld. James Bailey delivered the first of a series of Lectures on the Sabbath in the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in Plainfield, N. J. The lectures will be continued on successive Sabbath evenings for several weeks.

COLONIZATION IN NEBRASKA.—A plan is on foot in Boston to organize and have incorporated an Association to promote colonization of freemen in Nebraska. The capital proposed is six million dollars, and the persons having the thing in charge are of a character to insure success.

MARINE DISASTERS AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.—The storm of April 15th proves to have been very destructive to shipping. Several vessels were cast away on the Jersey shore; one of which, the Powhattan, had on board some two hundred persons, not one of whom was saved. She was first observed by the wreck-master at Absecom on Sunday morning, April 16th, thumping on the bar about 100 yards from the shore; but the sea ran so high that no help could be given her. Towards evening she keeled over so that many of the passengers were washed off. At length a wave struck her in such a way as to stave the hull and scatter the fragments in every direction. About one hundred and thirty bodies had been washed ashore at last accounts.

INTELLIGENCE FROM CHINA.—The N. Y. Tribune has a letter from Shanghae, China, dated Feb. 3, 1854, which says:—

The Imperialists' camp during the past month has presented a scene of ignominious inertia. They have rarely attacked the city, except at night. The insurgents, being quite annoyed by this method of warfare, sallied out some little time ago in a body of four or five hundred, and fought more than a thousand Imperialists for six hours, driving them from the field. The loss on the part of the Imperialists was considerable, while the rebels lost but three men killed and ten wounded. The imbecility of the Imperial leaders is manifested no less in their inability to restrain their troops from pillaging the poor peasants than in their want of skill in retaking the city and establishing law and order. Shanghae will probably remain in its present disturbed state for months to come. The rebels, it is said, have any quantity of supplies and munitions of war. Rumor reports rebellious movements in most of the eighteen provinces.

The following advertisement, carefully marked, comes to us in the Carolina Intelligencer, a religious paper (so called) printed at Shelby, N. C. Such a family, "free from incumbrance," is evidently considered a prize.

NEGROES FOR SALE.—Offered, by private sale, a family of Negroes, the mother and two children. The mother is eighteen years of age, less or more; the elder child, a girl, is upwards of two years and a half old; the younger, a boy, is between seven and eight months old. They are all stout and healthy. The mother is a good field hand; and as she is intelligent and submissive in her disposition, faithful and honest, she may be trained to be a good house servant. They can be sold free of all incumbrance. Apply to the subscriber at the Cross Roads, in Cleaveland county, on the way from Shelby to Morganton.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 17.

In the SENATE, a large number of remonstrances against the passage of the Nebraska bill were presented. Mr. Shields presented a memorial from 15,000 believers in spiritual manifestations, praying that an investigation may be had in the matter; the memorial was laid on the table. A bill was reported, carrying out the recommendation of the President for enlarging the Judicial System of the United States, and its consideration was made the special order for the first Monday in May. The House bill to graduate and reduce the price of the Public Lands, was then taken up, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Walbridge of New York moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer resolutions declaratory of our maritime rights, and against European interference on this continent; the motion was lost. The Committee on Ways and Means reported a substitute for the Senate's bill increasing the salaries of clerks, &c., in the Executive Department, which caused a short discussion, and pending a motion to reconsider, the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 18.

In the SENATE, Mr. Sumner presented a remonstrance against allowing the Amistad claim. Mr. Cass presented two memorials from citizens of the Jewish faith, praying that any effort to secure religious toleration to American citizens in foreign countries may include the members of their faith. Committee on Foreign Relations reported a bill for the further settlement of Spanish claims under the Florida treaty. A bill was reported regulating the pay of Pension Agents and the settlement of their accounts. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Homestead bill was taken up. Mr. Pettit made a speech in favor of the passage of the bill, and when he concluded, its further consideration was postponed. The bill allowing the exchange of school lands in Alabama, was passed.

The HOUSE, at an early hour resumed the consideration of the Senate bill to increase the salaries of clerks and other officers in the Executive Departments. The bill, amended so as to make the appropriation for the present year, was passed by a vote to 76 to 65. A bill was introduced to enable the people of Oregon to form a Constitution and State Government, and provide for the admission of such State into the Union. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the West Point Academy bill, as returned from the Senate with amendments.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 19.

In the SENATE, the Committee on Commerce reported a bill to prevent unnecessary delay in discharging the cargoes of vessels arriving from foreign countries; the bill passed. The Senate bill increasing the pay of Clerks in the Executive Departments was received from the House with two amendments—the bill was taken up, and the amendments concurred in. The bill to compensate the discoverer of practical anasthesia was taken up and passed. The bill provides for a suit between all persons claiming to be the first discoverer, and awards $100,000 to the successful party. The Homestead bill was then taken up. Mr. Adams of Mississippi, and Mr. Thomson of Kentucky, spoke in opposition to the bill.

In the HOUSE, the Senate bill extending the mail contract between Mobile and Montgomery, Alabama, was then taken up and debated until the expiration of the morning hour. The Senate bill appropriating lands for the benefit of the indigent insane in the several States, was then taken up, and passed by a vote of 81 to 53. The bill grants to the several States, for the benefit of indigent insane persons, 10,000,000 acres of land, to be apportioned under the direction of the President of the United States, in the compound ratio of the geographical area and representation of said States in the House of Representatives, according to the last census. The amount to each is to be invested, and the interest to be applied to the support of the insane.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 20.

In the SENATE, Mr. Brodhead presented petitions from Pennsylvania, that the Homestead bill be amended by providing for the payment back to purchasers of all money paid for public lands. Petitions from various States were presented praying for the aboli tion of Chaplains. Messrs. Wade and Sumner presented petitions against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. A bill for settling the accounts of certain mail contractors, where the contracts were suspended in 1838 and '39, was passed. The bill establishing a land system for the Territory of New Mexico was passed. After the consideration of Executive business, the Senate adjourned until Second-day.

The HOUSE, at an early hour, resumed the consideration of the Senate bill extending the existing contract for carrying the mail between Mobile and Montgomery, and, after two hours debate, the bill was passed. The House then went into Committee on the Senate's amendments to the West Point Academy bill, and after concurring in some of the amendments, adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 21.

The HOUSE only was in session, and spent the time in considering the bill to recompense the discoverers of practical Anaesthesia, the bill to increase the California mail service, and that for settling the claim of R. W. Meade for losses in Spain. No final action in either case. Adjourned to Second-day.

TRIAL OF MURDERERS.—The trial of Matthew F. Ward and Robert J. Ward, Jr., for the murder of W. H. G. Butler, was commenced at Elizabethtown, Ky., on Tuesday, April 18. The facts in this case were substantially as follows: Prof. Butler, the murdered man, in the capacity of school teacher, had occasion to correct a younger brother of the Wards, who was one of his pupils, for repeated and flagrant violations of the rules of the school. This, it appears, was thought too marked an insult and injury to the Ward family, who belong to "upper-tendom," to be tamely submitted to. Accordingly, the elder brother, Matthew F. Ward, author of "English Items," and own brother of the noted "Belle of the South," Sallie Ward, (afterward Mrs. Lawrence of Boston, and now Mrs. Hunt,) purchased two pistols, ordered them well loaded, and repairing with a younger brother to the school-room, deliberately shot down his victim, Prof. Butler. The trial will probably occupy several days, if not weeks.

European News.

By the steamer Asia, European dates to April 8th were received in New York on the 20th.

One of the most interesting features of the news brought by the Asia is the announcement made in the City article of the London Times of April 8, that the Turkish loan had failed after all, and that Namik Pasha had gone home without any money.

A correspondent at Vienna announces the conclusion of an alliance between the German powers, by which the entire Confederation, including Austria and Prussia of course, undertakes to maintain neutrality through the war.

From the seat of war on the Danube there is no intelligence of great importance; we must, however, soon hear of fighting in that quarter. The allied fleets are in the Black Sea, and Sir Charles Napier is advancing in the Baltic. The Russians are said to have abandoned the Island of Aland, and he can occupy it without difficulty.

In England the opinion is being adopted that the war must be a long and hard one.

April 26 is appointed as a National Fast Day throughout Great Britain, to pray for success in the present war.

The Central Jewish Consistory of France has petitioned the Emperor to extend the privileges about to be obtained for the Christians in Turkey to Jews who may be the subjects of the Sultan.

A riot occurred at Barcelona on the 13th. The military fired and killed several citizens.

Captain L'Herminat, of the navy, an aid-de-camp of Marshal Prince Jerome, on Friday evening entered the reading rooms of No. 28 in the Rue Rivoli, Paris, and asked to see the Patrie, and finding it engaged, sat down at the common table to read other journals. After some time the evening paper was handed to him, and he appeared to read it with great attention, but suddenly he drew a pistol from his pocket, blew his brains out, and fell a lifeless corpse in the midst of the company, whose horror may be conceived. He had lately sustained heavy losses at the Bourse. In all probability he asked for the Patrie to see the latest prices of the day, with the predetermination that his life should depend upon their being favorable or unfavorable to his latest speculation.

An Illustration of Slavery.

On the 5th of September, 1851, Edward Davis, a colored man, free, residing in Philadelphia, aged about 34 years, left that city with the intention of going to Hollidaysburg, but brought up at Havre de Grace, in the State of Maryland, where he went to work for a livelihood, as he probably supposed he had a right to do. But they have a law in Maryland which prohibits any free negro or mulatto, belonging to or residing in any other State, from going into that State for the purpose of settlement or otherwise, under a penalty of $20. Under that statute, Davis was arrested, taken before a magistrate and fined. Not having the money to pay, he was thrown into the Bell Air prison, where he remained about two months. He was then brought out, tried—for what offense we cannot say—and sentenced to be sold to pay his fine and expenses, amounting to $50. Subsequently, he was removed to a slave pen in Baltimore, and there employed to cook for some fifty or sixty slaves, being told that he was working out his fine and jail fees.

After being thus employed for about six months, he was taken out, handcuffed, and taken to Washington, and thence to Charleston, South Carolina. About this time he learned that he had been sold to William Dean, of Macon, Georgia. Upon his arrival at Macon he was set to work upon a railroad in the course of construction, and was worked so hard that his health soon gave out, when he was placed upon a cotton-plantation. Ultimately he was sent back to the railroad, but he soon broke down again, and in July 1853, he was taken to an infirmary in Macon, where he partially recovered. To the attending physicians he told the story of his wrongs. They tried to purchase him. One of his legs was drawn up so that he could not walk well, and they offered $400 for him, which his master refused. The directors wanted him to attend their patients, who were mostly slaves.

On the 12th of March last, he ran away from Macon and went to Savannah. There he hid in a stable until Tuesday afternoon, March 14th, when he secreted himself on board the Keystone State, a steamer which sails between Savannah and Philadelphia. At 9 o'clock the next morning the steamer sailed with Davis on board. The following day, the men, while heaving the lead, heard a voice from under the guards of the boat, calling for them to throw him a rope. Upon examination, it was found that the voice proceeded from a colored man concealed on a beam under the guards of the wheel-house. He was rescued from his perilous situation in a state of great exhaustion; his clothes were saturated with sea-water, as the sea had become rough, and he was dipped in the water at every roll of the vessel. The hands furnished him with a dry suit, and made him comfortable. But the commander of the boat was differently disposed. Fearing the effects of Georgian law, in case he should bring a slave to a free State, he ordered his vessel to put into Newcastle, Delaware, where he had the unfortunate man imprisoned, with the intention, it is stated, of taking him back to Savannah on his return trip.

But the facts of the case having leaked out, public sympathy was enlisted, and a determination shown that Davis should not go back to Georgia, unless it could be established that he was not entitled to his freedom. On the 20th of March the case was brought before Justice Bradford of Newcastle. A number of witnesses were examined and his freedom clearly proved. Mrs. Dimond, one of the witnesses, testified that she had known him since 1819, when he was about two years old. Her sister, Mrs. Martha C. McGuire, testified that she had known him for eleven or twelve years, and John H. Brady testified that he had known him for the last nine years. On hearing this testimony, the magistrate discharged him from custody, there being no reason why a free citizen of Pennsylvania should be kept in a Delaware prison with no crime charged against him. After his discharge, and before he had left the magistrate's office, the commander of the Keystone State appeared, made affidavit that he believed him (Davis) to be a fugitive slave, and afterward another to the effect that he believed him to be a fugitive from justice, whereupon he was detained and again shut up in prison.

The Captain now returned to Savannah, and one of the newspapers of that city contained this significant article:

"We are informed that the description of the late outside passenger by the Keystone State answers very well to that of a lost negro man belonging to Mr. Dean, of Macon. Measures have been taken by the claimant and the agent of the Philadelphia steamers for this city to ascertain the truth. The slave is said to have been recently brought from Maryland to Georgia."

In accordance with this announcement, measures were taken by the claimant to secure the return of Davis to a state of bondage. The case came on for trial before Mr. Samuel Guthrie, U. S. Commissioner at Newcastle, on April 16. The result of the whole was the remission of this free-born Pennsylvanian, who had thus heroically periled his life to regain his liberty, to the man claiming to be his owner. [N. Y. Tribune.

MONSTER STEAMBOAT.—The largest steamboat ever built was launched at Green Point, near New York, April 20th. She is 350 feet in length, 45 feet beam, and 15 feet depth of hold. Her floor timbers are of white oak, 20 inches thick; she has deep, double frames, sided 8 inches—making her frames 16 by 20 inches—and 4 inches apart. Besides being heavily timbered, she is diagonally braced from kelson up to top of timbers, with iron braces 5 inches wide, ¾ inch thick, and 30 feet long, crossing each other transversely, about 3 feet apart. These braces are secured to the frames with iron bolts, riveted to the timbers, and also riveted where they cross between the timbers. She has seven kelsons made of white oak timber, 14 inches wide and 3½ feet high. The bed timbers for her engine are of white oak, 4 or 5 feet wide and 6 feet high. Over 50 tuns of the best Ulster iron are used in her bracing. This steamer is intended for the Fall River route, and will run in connection with the Bay State and Empire State. Her engine, which is to be put in by the Novelty Iron Works, is of nearly double the power of any steam engine now in use. The cylinder is 105 inches in diameter by 12 feet stroke. The Metropolis will measure about 2,300 tuns burden. She will take her place on the Fall River line about the 1st of August.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.—The Legislature of New York adjourned without day on the 17th inst., after a session of nearly one week over the hundred days for which the Constitution allows the Members to draw pay. The sesssion was a busy one, and the number of acts passed was unusually large. The most important among them was the Liquor Prohibition Bill, which was killed by the Governor's veto. A subsequent bill, proposing a submission of the question of Prohibition to the people, passed the Senate, but failed in the House for want of time. The most important acts which have become laws are —1. that which provides for the vigorous prosecution and early completion of our Enlarged Erie and Lateral Canals; 2. the consolidation of Brooklyn, Williamsburg, and Bushwick; 3. the severance of the School Superintendence from the State Department, and its erection into a separate department, under a Superintendent of Public Instruction; 4. the trial of the experiment of letting out the repair of certain sections of the Canals by contract; and 5. the erection of the new County of Schuyler, out of portions of Chemung, Tompkins, and Steuben Counties, having (probably) its county buildings at Havana, near the head of Seneca Lake.

SUMMARY.

Mrs. Judith Town died at Paris Hill, N. Y., March 16th, aged 107 years. She was the daughter of Abner Hale, of Boxford, Mass, where she was born, October 14, 1747. Her family connections were from England, of the same original stock as Sir Matthew Hale. She was married to Absalom Town, of Boxford, in 1765, and was the mother of 11 children, 9 of whom survive her. She leaves also 31 grandchildren, and 21 great-grandchildren. She retained her faculties to a good degree. Hymns she learned when a child were frequently upon her tongue, and she could repeat the entire catechism after she was 100 years old.

It would seem that interminable litigation is to grow out of the Glover case at Milwaukie. Several peaceable citizens of Milwaukie and Racine have been put under $2,000 bonds to answer for aiding in the escape of Glover from jail; and they have also been sued by Garland, who claims of each of them $2000 for the value of his alleged slave. Besides these suits, General Paine, the counsel for the defense of Booth and others on their examination before the U. S. Commissioner, has been sued for slander, by a Captain Jennings, one of the witnesses for the prosecution.

The boiler of the steam ferry-boat Gen. Scott, exploded at Pittsburgh, on Saturday morning, 15th, killing the engineer of the boat, named McGinnis, breaking the arm and leg of another person, and the leg of a third. A two-horse wagon, loaded with hay, was thrown into the river, one of the horses by some means getting loose and making the shore; the other horse was drowned. The explosion was very loud, shaking the buildings for a great distance around, and the boat was shattered to pieces, making it almost a miracle that any lives were saved of those on board. The boat, it is stated, was racing at the time of the accident.

The late James P. Van Horne, of New York, made the American Bible Society the residuary legatee under his will, by which the Society will receive some $150,000. Many years may elapse before the Society comes into possession of this large gift. Mr. Van Horne gave about $70,000 to other benevolent associations.

According to the Sentinel, published at Selma, Alabama, during a period of four months, from October last to February, that State lost by emigration on an average 500 persons a day, or a total of 75,000; and the property carried out of the State is estimated at $78,670,000. So much for the peculiar institution.

The packet ship G. B. Lamar, recently arrived from London, had a very remarkable passage across the Atlantic. On the 9th inst., in lat. 47 deg. 40 min., lon. 47 deg. 19 min., she fell in with large quantities of floating ice, and was compelled to steer southeast 120 miles to get clear of it. Capt. Mayhew says that in fact he could see no end to the ice. Finally, his ship was surrounded by it, and had to sail through it for 12 hours. During this time he could see no water. At last she succeeded in getting through the ice, and steered southwest for half a day, meantime passing a large number of icebergs.

Mr. Resolved Givens, an old and much respected citizen of Schenectady, died very suddenly in that place, between 7 and 8 o'clock Sunday morning, April 16th. He had been to the barber's and had returned to his residence, and was sitting in his chair with his cane in his hand and his hat on his head when he expired. He was aged 88 years and 3 months. The extensive hotel in that place which bears his name was erected by him, and for a long time he kept the house.

Major Frazer, of the U. S. Engineers, is in Albany, preparing the way for the Government expenditure of $50,000 on the Hudson River. There have been a good many changes in the Hudson River recently, near Albany, in consequence of the washing away of the shore, and clearing away of the country whose waters flow into the Hudson. Latterly it has become exceedingly difficult to get even a steamer over the Overslaugh, except in certain conditions of the tide.

The Arctic brought intelligence of the death of Prof. Wilson, as well known, perhaps, by the favorite sobriquet of "Christopher North" of Blackwood's Magazine. Born in Paisley in 1788, he died on the 3d of April, 1854, at the age of 66. For the last four years he had been incapacitated from teaching his classes in the University of Edinburgh, having been smitten with paralysis, which prevented him from walking.

Charles Henderson, Esq., of Danville, Ky., has emancipated twenty-two of his slaves to go to Liberia under the direction of the Kentucky Colonization Society, in the May expedition from that State. He has also purchased the husband of one of his women servants at the price of $1,000. He gives to them all a full outfit, and to the Kentucky Colonization Society $500.

The Congregational Herald says that the Holy Spirit has descended on the congregation of Rev. J. A. Hawley, at Jackson, Mich. More than forty inquirers have attended the inquiry meeting, and twenty or thirty, it is believed, have been hopefully converted. Mr. Hawley is now holding a series of meetings at Barry, Mich. There are about twenty inquirers, and some converts are already embracing the truth.

The number of itinerant preachers of the Wesleyan Methodists of Great Britain is a little over 900, and of local preachers, between 13,000 and 14,000. The number of members in 1850 was 358,277, but in consequence of agitations on the part of the Reformers, their numbers for the year 1853 were only 270,265, showing a diminution in three years of 87,312.

The N. Y. Evangelist states that near $70,000 of the $100,000 fund proposed to be raised for church extension, in connection with the New-School Presbyterian Church, has been secured, and that it was contributed by less than one-quarter of the churches. The committee are about to issue a "last call," in hope of thereby securing the remainder.

The Hornellsville papers notice the perpetration of a robbery at the depot in that village on Thursday evening, very similar to that reported to have occurred in the case of Mr. Perkins, of Fredonia. Mr. O. M. Cody, of Little Genesee, Allegany Co., was knocked senseless when about twenty rods from the depot, and robbed of $1,840, and a detached silver lever watch.

Arrangements are in progress for a daily line of first class steamboats, having accommodations for 1,000 passengers each, to ply through the summer between New York and Newport as a Crystal Palace line, bringing passengers hither from Newport and giving them two tickets each to the Crystal Palace and returning them to Newport—all for one dollar!

One day last week A. J. Bleecker sold a portion of the estate of the late Anson G. Phelps, consisting of about 150 lots in Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth, Thirty-first and Thirty-third-sts., near the Second-av. The price varied from $960 to $5,900 each lot; and the total amount of the sale was nearly $267,000.

The Rev. J. B. Grinnel, who has been for five years pastor of a Congregational Church in this City, recently started for Sugar Grove, Iowa, sixty-five miles west of Iowa City, where he has purchased 8,000 acres of land, for the use of a colony of about thirty families, who are about to take up their residence at that fertile spot.

A few days ago, Fabien Bois, grocer and shipowner at Quebec, left that place in a large pilot boat, accompanied by Capt Bernier, Mr. Lortie, and two others, to visit a wreck stranded at Bersamis. Having accomplished that, he attempted to cross to L'Islet, and in so doing, the boat capsized, and the five men went down and were lost.

More than 3000 clergymen, of different denominations, in New England, have borne their public testimony against the Nebraska bill. A very large number of clergymen, in the other Northern States, have also spoken out fearlessly and promptly. But not a minister of religion, south of Mason and Dixon's line, has uttered a word against this movement to extend the area of slavery.

The Baptist Theological Education Society of Canada proposes to start a college at Toronto, Canada, to be called the Maclay College. The sum of £5,525 is reported as received for this object, and as this is sufficient to endow a theological professorship, Dr. Maclay has been appointed as professor.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives has adopted a proposition that the Secretary of State, Treasurer, and Receiver General, Auditor, and Attorney General, shall be chosen annually by the people on the day in November prescribed by law for the choice of Governor.

The grant of ten millions of acres of public land to be distributed among the States, to ameliorate the condition of the indigent insane, which passed the House of Representatives, and known as Miss Dix's bill, will fail to become a law—the President's signature being denied.

In July, 1853, Mr. C. R. Strong, of Strongville, Ohio, built the first houses, a store and dwelling, upon the line of the Illinois Central Railroad, 56 miles from Chicago, in the town of Kankakee, which now has a population of six hundred, and is the seat of justice of a flourishing county.

At Boston, in the matter of the Cochituate Bank, Judge Shaw decided that the temporary injunction continue until June the 5th, when the report of the special receivers appointed will determine whether the injunction shall be perpetual or the Bank resume business.

No immediate commercial change is anticipated as a consequence of the Russian war, but a continuation of it, it was believed, would cause a tight money market, which must be met by reduced business and refraining from new enterprises.

It is now fifty-five days since the steamship City of Glasgow sailed from Liverpool for Philadelphia, during which time not a word has been heard of her, and the apprehensions for her safety have increased to a painful extent.

A bill has passed the New York Legislature, regulating the manner that the Canal contracts are to be let. The contracts are specified to be for not less than three years, nor more than five years.

A Mr. Hyslip, of New York City, has obtained a verdict of $6,000 against the Western Railroad for injuries received by him while riding in defendant's cars between Greenbush and Springfield, September 9, 1850.

The Pennsylvania Legislature has finally passed the bill for the sale of the main line of the public works (Pennsylvania Railroad) for $10,000,000, and it has been sent to the Governor for his signature.

The New Bedford Mercury, says that nine whalers and one merchantman arrived at that port 20th inst., with 1,950 bbls. sperm and 17,200 bbls. whale oil.

Cholera among emigrant passengers from Liverpool is again becoming common. A ship which recently arrived at St. Johns had 35 deaths from that cause on board.

Mrs. Stowe, it is said, has made a donation of $1,000 in aid of a school established at Washington, by Miss Miner, for the education of colored children.

The bills of the Bank of Castleton, Vt., were thrown out last week by some of the banks, but John Thompson continued to buy them at one half of one per cent. discount.

In Amity, Allegany Co., N. Y., April 8th, by Eld. Charles Rowley, WILLIAM H. SMITH to MARY U. FLINT.

By the same, at the same time and place, SIMEON B. SMITH to ELIZA M. MIX.

At Shiloh, N. J., April 6th, by W. B. Gillett, RICHARD J. BONHAM to HANNAH A. DAVIS, daughter of Dea. Reuben Davis.

DIED.

In Rochester, N. Y., April 17, MARY P. GREENE, aged 18 years and 11 months. She was left without a mother at the tender age of seven years, which led her to reflect upon the necessity of a preparation for death. The sports in which her youthful companions engaged, had no charms for her. Three years previous to her death, she united with the First-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, Madison Co., where she remained a worthy member, till called to join the church triumphant. She had been afflicted with a disease of the spine for nearly four years, during which time many physicians were called, but none succeeded in removing the disease. As a last resort, she was taken to Dr. Hamilton's Analytic Institute in Rochester. For a time she seemed to improve, but on the 3d inst. took a violent cold, which caused a fever, terminating in death. The writer was with her during her last illness and conversed much with her concerning her departure from earth. At times she felt it hard to be so far from friends, and would say, "Take me home to die!" But she was enabled at length to say, "Not my will, but thine, O Lord, be done." As the hour of dissolution drew near, she requested the writer to say to her friends, that she could meet them no more on earth, but wished them to be in readiness to meet her in heaven; then imprinting a kiss on her cheek, said, "Give this kiss to my only brother—(her father having died two years previous)—tell him to be a good boy and prepare to meet Mary." At times she seemed to be conversing with departed spirits—would reach her arms as if embracing them, and exclaim, "Yes, I'll soon join you." She kissed all in the room, and died without a struggle. She has left a large circle of mourning friends, who at times almost feel it wrong, that one so sweet should so soon pass away. Her remains were taken to Brookfield, and funeral services attended the 19th. Sermon by Eld. J. Clarke, from Psalms 16: 11—"In thy presence is fullness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore."

F. J. L. C.

In Wellsville, April 18th, JABEZ M. CARTWRIGHT, in the 82d year of his age, after a protracted illness of many years, in which he suffered much from disease of the lungs. Mr. Cartwright had never made a profession of religion; but often in his last illness he manifested a considerable anxiety to be prepared to exchange worlds for the better. In conversation with him on the evening previous to his death, he said that he did not want to live any longer, if he could only go happy—that he had been a great sinner, but God was a great Saviour, and could forgive great sinners.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to he public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintainingit in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

Baby May.

Delicious little tit-bits of poetry sometimes go the round of the papers, which need only the prefix of a distinguished author's name to make them universally admired. As it is, they are just glanced over, with the remark, "I wonder who wrote that?" and forgotten. Of this sort is the following:—

When the charming month of flowers
Lit her earliest ray,
Came one from the angels bowers
To this pleasant home of ours,
For a while to stay:
So, acknowledging the favor,
We would think of nothing graver,
[illegible] month's own name we gave her—
Baby May!

Fitter name was never given—
So we fondly say,
Who have found the light of heaven
In her smile from morn to even,
Through the live long day;
For the sweet month's incarnation
Is this Eden exhalation,
With her spring-time appellation,
Baby May!

All the sweets of earliest roses,
On the dew-bent spray;
All the beauty that reposes
In the blossom when it closes
At the shut of day;
All the music that is ringing
Where the birds and brooks are singing,
She to us is fondly bringing—
Baby May!

Loud their dismal stories telling
Round us all the day,
Rude December winds are swelling,
But upon our peaceful dwelling
Sunshine smiles for aye;
For, within this home of ours,
Though the bleak December lowers,
Dwells the light of all the flowers—
Baby May!

Farm Fencing.

The subject of fencing, always of deep interest to agriculturists, is just now receiving a good deal of attention from the more scientific of them. At a meeting of the Farmer's Club connected with the American Institute, held in New York on the 18th of April, the whole session was given to the subject. From the N. Y. Tribune we copy the following account of what was said:—

Solon Robinson said he had proposed this question to the Club for the purpose of awakening discussion not only here, but among farmers generally, that they might be induced to think of the enormous tax self-inflicted upon themselves for needless fences. The late Nicholas Biddle made out a case from census figures, proving that the annual sum wasted in Pennsylvania to keep fences in repair, was more than ten millions of dollars a year, and there is no doubt but that sum may be multiplied by the number of States in the Union; making more than $300,000,000 worth of labor annually expended upon the fences of the United States. The question to be considered is, how much of this is wasted. Look at these facts—mere items in the general account. Within an hour of this room I have seen a farm divided into lots of one to five acres by heavy stone walls. It is moderate to calculate ten feet lost to cultivation for each line of fence, and that they cost a dollar a rod to build, and ten per cent. upon that ever after to keep in repair. "But," says the stone-wall advocate, "they were built to get rid of the stone—nothing else could be done with them." That is not so. Half of that very farm has a wet soil, and every acre would be doubled in value by underdraining; and if every foot of those stone-walls had been buried at the same cost of building, the farm would be worth this day twice as much as it could be sold for, with its miles of fence. Farms are common all over the country where the fence is worth more than the land. Let us start south from here and look at the poor farmers of New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware. It is no wonder they are poor, for every hundred of rails cost the poor, taxed farmer from seven to ten dollars; and it keeps him poor to keep his farm fenced. For what? That a few poor pigs, or kangaroo cows, may starve and steal in the highway, breeding mischief among neighbors, and occasionally offering a sacrifice of their worthless lives to the railway deities, but claiming a few human legs and arms as a token of remembrance, that in this country the liberty of the highway for cattle, is held of higher importance than legs, arms, or heads of human beings. In Delaware, great efforts have been made to escape the fence tax, by planting hedges; the County of Newcastle probably has more thorn hedges than any other County in the Union. The effort has been a good deal like that of a man who undertakes to lift himself by his own pantaloons—he does not get up much. I once said to a Delaware farmer that I had never seen a thorn hedge that was a good fence. "Come with me, then, and I will show you one." We were soon along side of it, and certainly there was a good fence—a good post and rail fence—in the field alongside of the hedge, as he said, to keep the cattle from eating up the hedge plants. We had no difficulty in finding an opening to get through into the road, and there we found a board fence. "What is that for?" "Oh!" said he, "my neighbors let their hogs run in the road, and I tried my hedge two or three years, stopping a hole here and there pretty often, as every body said it would be a good fence when grown; but it grew worse every year, and so I built a board fence, which keeps the hogs out. My rail fence keeps the cattle off, and the hedge is ornamental, don't you think it is?" and the whole only takes up about a rod wide of the richest land on the farm. However, hedges are the fashion, and that one—and I believe it is the only one in the State that is—is a good fence. This is in accordance with all my experience with thorn hedges. The late A. J. Downing had one around his beautiful place at Newburgh. When it was in its prime, it was a passable substitute for a fence. A pig, a calf, or a goose that would hesitate now to walk through it, is a poor goose; and so is any man who thinks a thorn hedge in this country a good permanent fence. In Virginia, I have seen a good deal of red cedar hedge. When young and thrifty it is very pretty, and, being always green and close in appearance, cattle, either horned, or with bristles, do not get through it, until they try. Then they do. After it gets old, they do not try, they go through without half trying. A better hedge is made of the dead boughs of cedar, wottled between stakes. This kind of fence is very common in Lower Virginia. It is frequently built on the top of a bank, thrown up from a ditch two to four feet deep on each side. That makes a good fence. True, it takes up some land, but what of that?—land is plenty in America, and if it were not we would soon fence in the Sandwich Islands. It makes no odds that a country has been denuded of fencing timber, like parts of New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia; or like the prairie land, that it never had any; people will fence it if they perish in the attempt—often are obliged to fence when they do not require it for their own use. I know one farmer in North Carolina who has to keep thirty miles of fence to keep other folks' cattle off of his land, without being benefitted thirty cents a year, so far as his own stock is concerned. In Mississippi there is a kind of hedge that is an effectual barrier to all domestic animals, negroes included. It is made of the Cherokee rose vine—not bush—for the branches grow thirty or forty feet long. The flowers are white, single roses, with large yellow centers, and when in full bloom, amid the dark green foliage, the hedge is very beautiful. If you ask if I have any objection to this kind of hedge, I answer, none in the least, as I own no land south of latitude 32 degrees, and it will not flourish north of that, and I am quite willing those who do should have a hedge that grows 25 feet high and 50 feet wide, and affords a good shelter for rats and other vermin, and occasionally takes fire, and being full of dead wood inside, it leaves the hedge row in a clean condition to build a rail fence and set out a new hedge. No part of the country expends so much labor in fencing as Mississippi and Louisiana. The cotton plantations are fenced with zig-zag fence of oak rails, generally stake-and-ridered, 10 to 16 rails high. Owing to heat and damp, the durability of rails does not exceed seven years. On some of the rich lands sumac and elder grow large enough to make rails. It is commonly calculated that it takes all the labor of a plantation one month a year to keep up the fences. Some of the sugar lands along the river are fenced at a great expense, with cypress posts and rails, to keep out the cattle which run in the road. Upon the prairies of the West thousands of miles of sod fence have been made, but not one rod in a mile remains. When first built, sod fences are pretty good barriers against all stock, but they soon crumble to dust. It is a strange thing that people will haul rails ten miles, and boards fifty miles to build fence. Very few if any attempts have been made to dispense with all fence upon the prairie land. Massachusetts is about the only sensible State I know of, for there you can raise a crop along side of a public highway without fencing it.

Prof. Mapes said, it appears by the last census that we had then 118,000,000 of acres of land in cultivation. It is a fair calculation to assume that this land is divided into an average of twenty-acre fields, and that the labor of fencing, exclusive of materials, is worth 50 cents a rod. This would be $113 25 for every field, and $670,766,273 for the whole, the simple interest of which will astonish any man who will make the calculation. This is a monstrous tax upon industry, beside the loss of land upon which the fence stands. I don't know how it is with others, but I cannot afford to lose the use of a strip six feet wide. Fields are cut up into amall lots just from custom, without any reason. Cattle are permitted to run into the road by custom—no law sanctions it, and no Legislature dares to make such a law. I cannot afford to pasture cattle, because it is cheaper to soil them; it may not be everywhere, but that is a subject for calculation. No one can afford it, unless upon very low-priced lands. Osage Orange Hedge is becoming very common in some places, but that is a matter of calculation whether it can be afforded. Mr. Randall told us here the other day that he has long lines of it upon his farm in Maryland, but is obliged to run a cutting plow along side to keep the roots within bounds, as the roots run out twelve feet each way. I believe this kind of hedge will make a good fence if you can afford the room. Stone walls may be built profitably in some places by making an underdrain under the wall. All walls should have a ditch filled with cobble stone, to prevent the frost from bearing down the wall. Wood posts for fence, should all be Kyanized at the bottom, or set reversed from the way they grew, with corrosive sublimate plugged in the upper end. It is best to Kyanize, and not so expensive. The sleepers of the Camden and Amboy Railroad were Kyanized and have lasted twenty-three years. The wood treated with corrosive sublimate never shrinks and swells or cracks. The best way to char posts is to wet them with cheap resin oil and burn it off. Copperas about posts in the ground preserves them. Wire fence has not yet answered the expectation. I commenced early and do not like to give up. I still hope that some plan will succeed. The difficulty is to provide against the contraction and expansion of the iron. The best way to paint wire fence is to take gutta percha which has been treated with white lead, and heat the wire with a lamp and rub on the gutta percha, which will adhere to the hot wire, and the white lead will give it the right color. Cattle on the road are a public nuisance, and no decent farmer in this age will be guilty of so great an outrage upon his neighbors as to turn out his stock to steal their living. It is actually a system of robbery, and there is a sort of mawkishness about people hesitating to abate the nuisance by legal means.

Ventilation.

The proper and best mode of ventilating rooms in private houses and public buildings has of late occupied much of the attention of the philanthropic and those who study their own health and happiness. Much has been said, and much has been written, on this subject; yet many who build houses now-a-days, seldom, if ever, give the subject a moment's reflection, when it ought to command as much, if not more than the necessary fixtures for a proper heating of a room. In order to ventilate a room well, it is necessary that there should be two openings—one for the exit of heated, impure air, and another for the entrance of pure, cold air. Heated air, as is well known, always rises upwards, and therefore it follows that in most of the apartments the whole of the room above the level of the fire-place becomes filled with impure air, which, as it cannot descend to escape through the chimney, is obliged to remain and constitute a quota toward the disease and unhealthiness of the occupants. A London paper recommends, as the cheapest and most effectual mode of ventilating rooms, "that in every apartment an opening be made in the upper part of the chimney, for the exit of the hot air, and that the pure outer air be admitted by means of a plate of perforated zinc, placed, instead of a pane of glass, in the upper part of one or more of the windows furthest from the fire. The air entering through the zinc in such small streams, becomes so gradually mingled with the warm air of the room, that a draught is prevented, and the whole atmosphere undergoes a continual, though imperceptible change. Cold air should never be admitted under the door, or at the bottom of a room, as it flows along the floor towards the fire-place, leaving the upper foul air unchanged, and cooling injuriously the feet and legs, which are peculiarly susceptible to atmospheric changes." The Science of Blacksmithing.

The Scientific American says:—Sawing heated iron and steel, is not known or thought of by blacksmiths; and when several forks or branches are to be formed from one stock, even if the branches are required to remain eventually nearly in contact, and parallel to each other, the usual method is to split the end of the iron with an awkward chisel; thereby deforming the edges of each branch; on which account the branches must be bent asunder for the purpose of hammering, squaring and shaping the edge of each; after which they are brought together as well as may be, usually retaining a roughness in form, if not a deficiency of size and strength, near the juncture of the branches. Instead of this tedious process, the iron when heated may be put into a vice, and the ends may be readily slit with a suitable saw, which would save much labor in hammering and filing. A saw for this purpose should be made thicker at the edge than at the back, and with uniform teeth about one-twelfth of an inch apart. The saw when used must be often dipped in water, to prevent its becoming too much heated. There is a method of sawing or cutting hardened steel, which is not so generally known as it should be. A circular piece of common thin iron plate, or sheet iron, being adjusted to a lathe, or by other means put into a violent rotary motion, will readily cut off a file, a cutting tool, or tempered steel spring, without drawing or reducing the temper. There is much mystery in the wonderful effect of this buz, and its cutting property is attributed to electricity. It answers a very convenient purpose, however, when the shape and form of articles are required to be altered without affecting their temper. It furnishes a convenient method for cutting teeth to large saws, but objectionable on account of the newly cut surface being left so hard that they cannot be readily filed by a common file. Connected with the subject of "mysterious effects," it may be stated that a bar of iron of almost any size, may be instantly sundered while hot, by the simple application of a piece of common roll brimstone. A knowledge of this fact will be useful, when some piece of iron work is required to be severed, but which, as is sometimes the case, is so constructed and situated that no ordinary chisel or cutting tool can be brought to apply. Holes may be instantly perforated through bars or plates of heated iron, by the application of pointed pieces of brimstone. This phenomenon is curious, although it seldom affords much practical utility.

Turkish Women.

The care with which the Osmanlis have always kept their wives and daughters apart, still prevails in Constantinople. To ask a Turkish gentleman after his wife or his daughter, is to give him mortal offense. If he alludes to them he calls them "the home," or "the house." He will tell you that the house is well. Also when he announces to his friends the birth of a daughter, he says, "a veiled one," or "a stranger has been given to me." He is taught by the Koran to honor his wife, and to believe that she will be, equally with himself, a participator in heavenly felicity. This teaching effectually displaces the vulgar error that declares the Mahommedans to believe women have no souls. Polygamy is allowed to this day in Turkey, but it is so surrounded with social and religious difficulties that it is rarely practiced. The Koran allows a Mussulman to marry four legitimate wives, but tells him expressly that it is meritorious to marry only one. In Constantinople the ulemas, the great bodies of government officials, the naval and military officers, the tradesmen and the workmen, have generally only one wife. In the provinces one wife is even more universally the rule. And now, all the great officers of the State make a merit of wedding one wife only, to show a good example to their countrymen. Nor is the wife a slave entirely. In her own apartment she is supreme mistress. She may receive her female friends, and her male relations; she may go out in the day-time; (veiled and attended;) and her husband consults her on all his affairs. She is not the painted doll we have read of. She is thoroughly domestic, and is effectually protected by the State from cruel treatment. The Mussulman is bound by law to maintain her according to his rank; if he fails in this she may claim a divorce. When he marries her he gives a present to her relatives, instead of expecting a dower, as with us. She has the care of the household, and if he be poor, she employs her leisure in spinning. She has the exclusive right, by law, to bring up her children—the girls until they are married, the boys until they enter one of the public schools. If the Ottomans have one tender chord in their breasts, it is that which is always awakened within them at the sound of the maternal name. Women may even perform the functions of the Imam, recite prayers, and under extraordinary circumstances they may be invested with political powers. Yet, undoubtedly, the Turkish woman is not yet free. The law allows her to see her distant relatives only once in each year, if her husband objects to more frequent visiting; her near relatives are also subject to legal interference.

HARDSHIPS OF FARMERS.—The Hampshire Gazette gives the following as the pith of a speech by President Hitchcock, at the late Cattle Show in Amherst:—

Dr. Hitchcock followed, and in a pleasant way proceeded to speak of the hardships of farmers. They were obliged to cultivate their fields in order to make them produce; they must stay at home, and not spend their time in grog-shops. In order to prosper, they must educate their children if they would have them grow up men and women; and then, worst of all, their fine cattle and good products will be taken away by men who leave nothing but money in the place of them. He closed with the following sentiment:

The Farmers of the Connecticut Valley—
May their hardships go on increasing till they cry out for very joy.

The Indian Chief Logan.

A monument to the memory of the brave and eloquent Indian Chief Logan is to be erected on the grounds comprising the site of Fort Alleghan and the ancient village of Osco, within the limits of the city of Auburn. According to the traditions of the Cayuga Indians, as we learn from a letter of Da-ne-ho-ga-wa, the presiding Sachem of the Iroquis, Logan, was a Cayuga, and was born in the Cayuga country, but at what time is not said; that while he was young he emigrated with a portion of his tribe to the South, and subsequently to the West, where he became connected with the Shawnee nation, then living in Ohio; that by his talents he attained the rank of Chief, and soon become the most prominent leader of his nation, particularly in their civil affairs, having received much instruction in the Indian civil polity from his father (Shikelinus) he being familiar with the Iroquois code. Logan lived in little village near the Ohio, where he was the acknowledged ruler of its inhabitants, who were known to the whites as "the friendly Indians." At one time, as Logan's band, including his family and kindred, were returning, some from the labors of the fields, and others from the sports of the chase, they were waylaid by Capt. Cresap's party and killed. The few left in the village with Logan fled into the wood, leaving him alone. The transaction caused suspicion to be raised against him among the Shawnees, and he applied to the Iroquois for assistance. It was proposed that, as the Shawnees did not incline to avenge the wrong, the Iroquois send out a war party to protect Logan from unjust suspicions of intending wrong. This was finally overruled by the Sachems, who resolved to send a deputation of wise men with Logan to make complaint and demand reparation of the proper authorities. This was done, Logan himself making the talk and setting forth his grievances. It was at this time, according to my understanding of the tradition—writes the Chief Da-ne-ho-ga-wa—that he delivered that truly pathetic and eloquent appeal accredited to him by Thomas Jefferson. It is an appeal, in which power of genius, combined with the most intense feeling, rendered it worthy to be classed among the choicest effusions of the great orators of any age. I have seen Mr. Mayer's denial of the Logan story, but his effort appears to me a laborious attempt to conceal or wipe out the inglorious stigma that must forever rest upon Capt. Cresap's character. Logan received no satisfaction, and sending home the Iroquois deputation, and laboring under heavy misfortunes, he retired alone into the woods, and died unhonored and unmourned.

The Tower of London.

On the left bank of the Thames, about a mile below London bridge, and in the oldest part of the metropolis, stands one of the chief monuments of history. Its gray turrets are among the first objects to arrest the eye of a stranger entering London from the sea; and the most careless mariner, who drops down the river on his outward voyage, can scarcely pass the dismal water gate, through which, from age to age, a long procession of the wise and the brave, the beautiful and the innocent, has passed never to return, without some transient touch of human feelings. In the long line of gay or noble victims—victims of policy or private hate—the eye catches, as it were, and singles out, among the crowd of Howards, Sidneys, Poles, Plantagenets, two supremely striking figures—both women—both Queens—mother and child—Anne Boleyn and her daughter Elizabeth. These stairs have felt their footsteps; and the shadow of the stone arch has fallen on their souls. The tyrant's wife fell on her knees humbly on the cold stairs, and prayed that God would help her, "as she was not guilty of the thing of which she stood accused." His daughter, proud in her blood, and prouder in her innocence, set her foot on the step as though it were the neck of a rival, saying aloud—"Here landeth as true a subject, being a prisoner, as ever landed at these stairs; before Thee, O God, I speak it." How much of character in these brief words! These queenly forms, however, are but figures in the grand procession. Sidney passed beneath that arch, and Russell, and Moore, and Elliott, and Catharine Howard, the aged Countess of Salisbury, the youthful Lady Jane Grey, and Bacon, and Leicester, and Essex, and Southampton, and Henry Vane, and Stafford, and Monmouth—names and fames in which the story of a nation's life, its intellectual, moral, and material being is defined and summarily expressed. Hower looked at, the Tower of London fills the mind with images of heoric forms, with recollections infinitely various, striking, mournful, and august. Turret and bastion, wall and ditch, chapel and tower, store-room and promenade, each has its story. Every stone is monumental, every tree is a witness of events marked by dramatic movements, swiftness, splendor, and woe. In the low hum which rises from the pile, broken at intervals by the roll of drum, by blasts of trumpet, fancy will catch the sounds of ancient days—the echoes of uproarious revelry, the falling ax, the hush of the council, the murmur of the Queen's virginals, and the tripping feet of her ladies' dancing, the muffled agony of the tortured victim, the pomp of a coronation day, or the jocund laughter of a bridal feast. From the reign of Stephen to the expulsion of James II., the Tower was a royal residence as well as a state prison; and for all the intervening years its history is the history of the English Court.

THE PRICE OF NEWSPAPERS.—Rev. Thomas Carlton, says the Presbyterian Herald, recently made a report of the operations of the Methodist Book Concern, New York, to the Baltimore Conference. It has a capital of nearly half a million of dollars, after all its liabilities are met. On their books and tracts they have declared a handsome profit during the past year, but on their periodicals, of which they have circulated 177,400 copies, they have lost about six thousand dollars in consequence of the reduction in their price. The German Reformed Book and Newspaper Publishing Concern report a loss of about six hundred dollars on the Messenger, published by them at $2 in advance, or $2 50 at the end of six months. The Messenger has six columes on a page, and a circulation of twenty-five hundred copies.

PLEASANT TRAVELING.—Dr. Hooker, in the course of his Himalayan Journal, just published, gives the following sketch of a pleasant excursion on the Nepaulese Himalaya: "Leeches swarmed in incredible profusion in the streams and damp grass, and among the bushes; they got into my hair, hung on my eyelids, and crawled up my legs and down my back. I repeatedly took upwards of a hundred from my legs, where the small ones used to collect in clusters on the instep; the sores which they produced were not healed for five months afterwards. I retain the scars to the present day. Another pest is a small midge, or sand-fly, which causes intolerable itching and subsequent irritation, and is in this respect the most insufferable torment in Sikkim; the minutest rent in one's clothes is detected by the acute senses of this insatiable blood-sucker, which is itself so small as to be barely visible without a microscope. We daily arrived at our campaigning ground streaming with blood, and mottled with the bites of peepsas, gnats, midges, and mosquitoes, besides being infested with ticks."

VARIETY.

The Perthshire Advertiser reports a recently discovered mode of conversing with those afflicted with partial deafness, viz., by taking the individual by the hand, at the same time placing the two thumbs together. By this simple process, the sound is conveyed in a more direct manner to the ear, and the person spoken to will hear distinctly in a tone of voice several notes lower. It is also important to add, that a chain could be formed upon the same principle, by a number joining hands in the manner alluded to, when the individual affected will hear [illegible] a moderate key at either end of the chain.

Douglas Jerrold, the well-known contributor to Punch and editor of various publications, is a man about 50 years of age, and in person is remarkably spare and diminutive. His face is sharp, angular, and his eyes of a greyish hue. He is of the most caustic writers of the age, and with keen sensibility he often writes under the impulse of the moment articles which his cooler judgment condemns. His "Caudle Lectures" have no doubt been read by every one. In conversation he is quick at retort—not always refined. He is a husband and grandfather.

Silas Hewitt, of Seneca Falls, has dared to offer the world another patent churn. The greatest curiosity about this last of the churn family is, how any man could invent one different from the thousand and one already lumbering the Patent-Office. This he has done by making two upright shafts, instead of one, armed with spokes, which, being driven rapidly by a crank, with two bevel wheels working into pinions upon the head of the shafts, give them a motion which throws the cream to the center, where it is broken up, instead of passing around in a continuous circle.

A World's Concert has been held at Constantinople, conducted by the American, Scotch, and English missionaries, the chaplains of the English and Prussian embassies, and the native Armenian pastors. The exercises were in three languages, Armenian, Turkish, and Greek. Hymns of the same measure were sung at the same time, to the same tune, in three different languages; and though the words and sentiments were all different, there was no discordance.

The difference between the Lutheran and the German Reformed Churches, which many regard as one and the same, is thus stated by the Lutheran Observer: "The Augsburg Confession comprehends the creed of the Lutheran, while the Heidelberg Catechism is that of the German Reformed. The former have nearly 1,000 ministers and 2,000 churches in the United States, while the latter report 197 ministers and 562 churches."

A report from the United States Commissioner of the Land Office states that the whole surface of the public domain covers 1,391,480,320 acres. This is 220,704,509 acres less than the quantity stated in the annual report. The discrepancy is occasioned by an over estimate of the land in Oregon, Nebraska and the Indian territories, which later and more perfect maps have enabled the bureau to correct.

The accounts of the Synod treasurer of the missions of the United Presbyterian Church, for the year 1853, have just been made up, and it is gratifying to state, that the large sum of $100,000 has this year been contributed by the various congregations of this body, in support of the home and foreign operations of the Synod. This sum is larger by $15,000 or $20,000 than any former year.

No. 12—Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to GEORGE B. UTTER, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

Concluded from the Recorder of April 27, 1854.

But more immediately near the place of the Saviour's glory, and therefore, perhaps, offering what may seem a more probable application to the scene which is to be an abhorring unto all flesh, there shall be another spectacle of Millennial fire and desolation: "Come near, ye nations, to hear; and hearken, ye people; let the earth hear, and all that is therein; the world, and all things that come forth of it. For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies; He hath utterly destroyed them; He hath delivered them to the slaughter. Their slain also shall be cast out, and their stink shall come up out of their carcases, and the mountains shall be melted with their blood. And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree. For my sword shall be bathed in heaven; behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment. The sword of the Lord is filled with blood; it is made fat with fatness, and with the blood of lambs and goats, with the fat of the kidneys of rams; for the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea. And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust made fat with fatness. For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion. And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; THE SMOKE THEREOF SHALL GO UP FOR EVER; from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it FOR EVER AND EVER." (Is. xxxiv. 1—10.)

That this refers to events that are future, and that shall take place at the coming of the Lord, appears evident; while apart from expressions confessedly figurative, there remain statements remarkable for their force as bearing upon the point before us. The dust of the land is to be turned into brimstone, and its streams into pitch, in a state of ignition, while "the smoke thereof shall go up for ever." And this because Edom is the people of God's curse, and "the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion" has come. We enter upon no consideration, here, of the nature or manner of Idumea's peculiar offense; but we quote Jeremiah also predicting for it a doom like that of Sodom and Gomorrah: "Also Edom shall be a desolation; every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss at all the plagues thereof. As in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbor cities thereof, saith the Lord, no man shall abide there, neither shall a son of man dwell in it." "Surely, He shall make their habitations desolate with them. The earth is moved at the noise of their fall; at the cry, the noise thereof was heard in the Red Sea." (Jer. xlix. 17–21.) Do not such statements give significancy to the questions of the prophet, with the answers of our Lord: "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in His apparel, traveling in the greatness of His strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat? I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me; for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come." (Is. lxiii. 1–4.) And Habakkuk, in his prayer, says, "God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. Selah. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of His praise. And His brightness was as the light; He had horns coming out of his hand; and there was the hiding of His power. Before Him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at His feet. He stood and measured the earth; He beheld, and drove asunder the nations, and the everlasting mountains were scattered, the perpetual hills did bow." "Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers. The mountains saw thee, and they trembled; the overflowing of the water passed by; the deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands on high. The sun and moon stood still in their habitation; at the light of thine arrows they went, and at the shining of thy glittering spear. Thou didst march through the land in indignation; thou didst thrash the heathen in anger. Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people." (Habak. iii. 3–13.)

Edom stretches nearly due south from the extremity of the Dead Sea; and without giving a more decided opinion, as to this land's being the future place of doom of those who "shall be an abhorring unto all flesh," we may remark, that if we understand the position of that great square called The Holy Oblation, which is to be dedicated to God, when the Land of Israel is to be divided among the Twelve Tribes, as described in Ezek. xlviii., and in which both the rebuilt sanctuary and the city called "The Lord is there" are to be, its eastern boundary runs nearly parallel to the Dead Sea, and therefore that neither of these holy places could be greatly distant from the northern boundary of Idumea. And as "all the land shall be turned as a plain from Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem," (Zech. xiv. 10,) while yet it is to be elevated to mountain height—for "the mountain of the House of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills," (Micah iv. 1,) favorable opportunity may be even afforded thereby for the observation of contiguous places and objects.

In the description given by John, indeed, the punishment of every man who shall "worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand," is announced by a different angel than the one who declares the destruction of Babylon, and may not therefore apply to precisely the same event. And if referred to Edom, one of the circumstances mentioned would thus admit of more easy and appropriate application; for it is said of those who shall have so sinned, "the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured without mixture into the cup of His indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever." (Rev. xiv. 9–11.) The torment thus spoken of, expressly and specifically, as endured "in the presence" of Christ and of His angels, seems to require that we understand it as at no great distance from the place of manifestation of the Saviour's glorified humanity; and still more does it seem to require that it be comparatively near where they are said to be tormented "in the presence of the holy angels." If, therefore, correct in the arrangement, these texts would seem to give more definiteness to the statement of the prophet relative to those who shall come up to the place in which the Lord shall be visibly present, in order that they may worship Him, on New Moons and Sabbaths, going forth thence to look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against Him, whose worm dieth not, and whose fire is not quenched, when they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

It would be too painful to dwell upon this. We may not leave it, indeed, without acknowledgment of God's grace to be seen in that sad display. The contemplation of what is thus presented to us of the terror of the Lord, is surely well fitted, even now, to lead us from the indulgence of whatever has the expression of God's displeasure upon it, and which in a time of greater righteousness among men shall even be an abhorring unto all flesh. And while we shudder even at the thought of the dread spectacle, let us remember that however awful such a scene must be, still its maintenance will assuredly be necessary for men then alive in the flesh. And God's setting up some beacon is in perfect accordance with His dealings in the past ages of the world's history. For when the sin of our first parents had occasioned their expulsion from Eden's garden, the cherubim, with the flaming sword turning every way, to keep the way of the tree of life, reminded them forcibly of the evils of their transgression. How long that expressive intimation was continued, we are not informed; but when, in course of time, God saw that the wickedness of men was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually, and when, in farther vindication of the divine righteousness, the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the flood had swept men nearly all away, to Noah and his descendants, the upheaved and shattered rocks, with other tokens of the devastation which the flood had occasioned, remained as remembrancers of the awful evil of sin. And when, once more, the aggravated guilt of those of the cities of the plain caused fire and brimstone to overwhelm them, over the site on which they had stood the nauseously-bitter waters of the deep Dead Sea were made to roll, in abiding memento of God's righteousness, so awfully vindicated upon their ungodliness. And when, farther, the sin of Israel and of Judah had gone up to heaven against them, even the Temple of the Lord itself, with the city of Jerusalem, were laid in ruins, and that entire people were driven forth from their land and scattered among all the nations of the earth, those Gentiles were admonished of the consequences of transgression, by the fact itself that the Lord's people were captives among them, while over the land which God had espied for that people, the heavens became as iron, and the earth as brass, cursing with barrenness a soil which had been preëminently fruitful until defiled by their transgression.

But, in the coming time of Millennial bliss, each and all of these solemn symbols of divine displeasure shall have been taken away. Paradise restored, the gates of the new Jerusalem shall stand ever open, while the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it, and while the nations of them that are saved do walk in the light of it. Clothed with perpetual verdure and beauty, the earth also shall bring forth abundantly; and Israel having been recalled from their rebellion and from their wanderings, their land especially shall receive peculiar blessing. Even the Dead Sea itself, which hitherto, in accordance with its name, has sustained no living thing, then receiving the new tributary river, which comes forth from the House of the Lord, and going eastward, down through the desert, till mingling with those waters, now so sterile and so bitter, these shall be healed, and there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither. (Ezek. xlvii. 1–10.)

Thus the consequences and the tokens of man's previous rebellions being thus obliterated and removed, and even new heavens and a new earth having come in room of the heavens and earth which are now, another and more awful memento of sin's exceeding sinfulness is designed of God to be given unto the nations; for, as all flesh, from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, come up to worship before the Lord, they shall go forth and look upon the carcases of the men who have transgressed against Him. Dread, indeed, must be the sight, intended as it is to remind men continually of the evils of sin by an exhibition of its direful consequences. And that this blessed effect shall be the result, we are here assured, for "they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." Thus, as the successive crowds of those who love and fear the Lord, come to worship before Him, repair to the scene of His glory, and, from the contemplation of His righteousness there, go forth to look upon the scene of sin's retribution, and beholding the punishment which transgression has entailed, they leave not the land of Immanuel without a deeply-impressed lesson derived from the sight of these, the monuments of Jehovah's wrath. They pass from the palace of the Prince of peace to the prison of the rebellious. It almost seems as a prospective improvement of this very sight, that leads the same prophet elsewhere to claim, "The sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites; who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" (Is. xxxiii. 14.) And it becomes every one, even under the influence of the terror of the Lord, carefully to watch against even the beginnings of sin, of which the tendency is progression, and of which such awful judgment is the reward of comsummation.

In this discussion of Scripture predictions concerning the Sabbath of the future, we have given little scope to imagination. It has been our aim to keep close to the things which are revealed, as what belongs to us and to our children. But, while joying in God, and giving thanks to His name that He has vouchsafed His blessed Sabbath for good, not to Israel only, but to the sons of the stranger also; and while grieving that any should deny themselves of the privilege so graciously conferred, let us, for encouragement and strength in the discharge of duty and labor of love towards others, look forward in faith to that brighter and better day, when the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together. Truly, "we are saved by hope;" so that, as by the eye of faith we descry, through Heaven's record, the joyous throng from many lands passing onward from city to city, enlivening the way with songs of praise and triumph in their progress Zionward, to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, we are even now reänimated to strive anew against the tide of ignorance and prejudice, while seeking to persuade our brethren universally to accept the heavenly gift for their good, obeying in love the commandment of the Lord as it is given in His inspired word. And as, again, with the same eye of faith, we behold those devout pilgrims filled with adoring love and gratitude to Him who sitteth upon the throne; their hearts burning within them in remembrance of His grace, they retire from the glory of His immediate presence, musing also on the sad infidelity and ingratitude of bygone ages, and sorrowfully going forth to look upon the carcases of the transgressors, including, it may be, in the number, those who thought to change times and laws, and marking the undying worm and unquenched fire, let us meditate anew and more deeply on the evil of departure, through unbelief, from the living and true God. In faith, farther, see such pious travelers returning from the sad overpowering spectacle of sin's recompense, and with deepened impressions of its exceeding sinfulness, proceeding once more to the Temple of the Lord, to contemplate anew the sacrificial symbols of the accomplished work of man's redemption by the blood of the covenant, and aided to higher conception of the love therein displayed, passing thence on their homeward path, every heart solemnized by remembrance of the sights and scenes thus witnessed, with firmer resolution, in the strength of the Lord, henceforth to live in closer fellowship with Him in all things, let it be our purpose and aim also to walk in all the statutes and ordinances of the Lord blameless, having truly all our works wrought in God.

NINEVEH AND BABYLON.

The cities of Nineveh and Babylon are among the most striking illustrations of the evanescent character of earthly glory. In their day they were the pride and boast of their inhabitants, and since then they have been the theme of historians, and the wonder of the world. To the Christian, too, they possess more than a passing interest. We find them spoken of in the Bible in connection with some of the most interesting events recorded there, and when they are spoken of they immediately recall to mind Jonah, Senacherib, the captive Israelites, Nebuchadnezzar, the people of Judea, Daniel and Cyrus. And yet, while these cities, which were once so vast and glorious, have continued to be the objects of so much interest that their ruins have been carefully sought by every passing traveler, the exact sites on which they stood have been for centuries unknown. To the thoughtful Christian, however, this fact, although striking, is not a matter of surprise; for he remembers the fearful denunciations uttered against them by the prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Nahum; and while with others he sees in their fall the mutability of human greatness, he finds in their utter desolation an additional proof of the truth of that book which is the foundation of all his hopes.

Among the more prominent travelers who in recent times have visited the supposed site of these cities, we may notice Major Keppell, Capt. Mignan, Sir Robert Ker Porter, and Messrs. Rich and John Silk Buckingham. These have all thrown some light on the condition of these interesting cities.

[Freewill Baptist Quarterly.

LAND OF THE LIVING.—Said one to an aged friend: "I had a letter from a distant correspondent, the other day, who inquired if you were in the land of the living." "No," replied the saint-like, venerable man; "but I am going there. This world is alone the world of shadows; and the eternal is the only one of living realities."

THE DEAD.

The dead are everywhere!
  The mountain side, the plain, the wood profound;
All the wide earth—the fertile and the fair—
  Is one vast burial ground!

Without the populous streets,
  In solitary homes, in places high,
In pleasure-domes, where pomp and luxury meet,
  Men bow themselves to die.

The old man at his door;
  The unweaned child murmuring its wordless song;
The bondman and the free, the rich, the poor,
  All—all to death belong!

The sunlight gilds the walls
  Of kingly sepulchres enwrought with brass;
And the long shadow of the cypress falls
  Athwart the common grass.

The living of bygone time
  Builded their glorious cities by the sea,
And awful in their greatness sat sublime,
  As if no change could be.

There was the eloquent tongue;
  The poet's heart, the sage's soul was there;
And loving women, with their children young,
  The faithful and the fair.

They were, but they are not;
  Suns rose and set, and earth put on her bloom,
Whilst man, submitting to the common lot,
  Went down into the tomb.

And still, amid the wrecks
  Of mighty generations passed away,
Earth's honest growth, the fragrant wild flower, decks
  The tomb of yesterday.

And in the twilight deep,
  Go veiled women forth, like her who went,
Sister of Lazarus, to the grave to weep,
  To breathe in low lament.

The dead are everywhere;
  Where'er is love, or tenderness, or faith;
Where'er is pleasure, pomp, or pride; where'er
  Life is or was, is death!

LETTER FROM PALESTINE.

PHILADELPHIA, April 10th, 1854.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following is to-day received, and, as it contains confirmatory intelligence of the little Sabbath Colony in Palestine, will you give it publicity in your columns?

In Christian love, yours, J. L. BOYD.

PLAINS OF SHARON, near Jaffa, Feb. 26, 1854.

DEAR BROTHER BOYD,—About ten weeks have elapsed since I and my family were permitted, by the kindness and protection of our Heavenly Father, to set foot upon the land of promise, after a passage of seventy days from our native country to the land promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and to their seed forever. On our arrival, we were received with open arms and warm hearts by sister Minor and her associates in labors of love for down-trodden Israel. With them we took shelter until we could obtain a place elsewhere.

In a week or two we leased the remaining half of the garden or plantation now occupied by them, consisting of a two-story house, with an L the same height, having the walls broken down, as also the walls that encircle the house and out-buildings. The quantity of land we hired is about seven acres, with crops already growing upon it, consisting of three acres of wheat, three acres of barley, and 1 acre planted with garden vegetables, such as peas, beans, turnips, cabbage, onions, rootabaga, beets, lettuce, and a few sweet potatoes. Most of these vegetables were in a mature state, having been sown last October. On this acre are 250 orange trees, loaded down to the ground with ripe golden fruit; likewise lemon, apple, peach, quince, almond, palm, banana, pomegranate, plum, and pear trees, all thrifty. On the other six acres are 2500 mulberry trees, at the right age for producing leaves for silk, which is manufactured here to a considerable extent. One of the three acres of wheat we have sown since we hired; likewise a small patch of oats and buckwheat.

After we had hoed and weeded the garden, we bought limestone, and such lumber as was necessary, and commenced repairing the house. With our own hands we cleared away the rubbish and reared up the broken-down walls, and made such other repairs as were necessary; and three weeks ago we left the house of our kind sister Minor, and removed to our new home, happy and contented, all enjoying sound health, with the exception of one daughter, who was out of health when we left America, yet has much improved since leaving.

I have purchased of one man three cows, two calves, six sheep, four lambs, seven goats, and four kids. These all graze upon government land, and elsewhere upon land not cultivated, free of expense, except a small sum for a shepherd; have likewise purchased eight fowls. We had employed before we purchased our little flock, as laborer and interpreter, a German Christian brother who has been laboring in the same field of benevolence some three or four years, and who has about the same number of cows, calves, and goats that I have, making about fifty in all. These two flocks we have united, and he takes care of them, going out in the morning, and returning at evening.

We introduced the pump sent to Mrs. Minor by American friends by us when we came, into a well 75 feet deep and 10 feet in diameter at the bottom, and 15 feet at the top. This was rather a difficult job, as this and all the wells are dug through a sandstone formation down to a level with the sea, where sand and water are obtained; not a drop of water can be procured until digging through the ledge; when once through into the sand two or three feet, inexhaustible water is obtained, never rising higher than the bottom of the ledge. This ledge is perfectly compact, without seam or crevice, yet not so hard but what it may be penetrated with a pickaxe, and being sufficiently hard, the well requires no stoning. We secured the pump and pipe against one side of the well by coupling small timbers together by tenons and mortices from the bottom of the well to the top, bracing each way by digging a hole into the stone to receive one end, and nailing the other to the timber. The pump we bolted to the timber, 25 feet from the water; the 50 remaining feet above of pipe and piston rod, we secured to the timber with staples. It operates very well for family use; but I doubt whether enough can be raised through a pipe of this size to water the garden, even if it should be in operation day and night.

In relation to the soil on these extensive plains, it is rich, black, and deep, capable, so far as I can judge from the appearance of the crops now growing, of producing with proper management any disirable amount. The principal crops of grain are wheat and barley. Another pretty profitable crop is sesamine, from which oil to burn and eat is extracted. These plains are rich and extensive, reaching in width from the city of Jaffa to the mountains beyond Ramlah, being 10 miles; and in length much farther, (120 miles.) It is principally government land, excepting some few gardens or plantations purchased by individuals. About the years 1842 and '43, the Sultan issued an edict, that this land should be cultivated. Accordingly, wells were dug, houses built, very many orange and mulberry trees were set out, together with the varieties I have mentioned as growing in our garden. Very many of these are forsaken—walls broken down, and are for sale at a low rate. The houses were some finished, and some not. It appears to me, from the limited information I have obtained from different sources, that land might be purchased, and a colony established to any extent for the reception of poor Jews, who are very desirous to cultivate the soil, as we have had abundant proof, by frequent applications since we have been here. I think nothing is wanting but the means, and efficient helpers. We have, thus far, had the most manifest tokens of friendship from the inhabitants, and that too from characters of distinction; for instance, the former Governor of Gaza, who now resides in Jaffa, and owns two plantations out about half a mile from the city. He made us a call, to examine the operation of the pump. He was highly pleased with it, and expressed himself in the warmest and most friendly terms, that we had come to this land; and said he would be my brother, and my son Henry's father. wanted I should go to his gardens, and ascertain if pumps could be put into his wells; which I did. He afterwards called, with his wife and child, and cavase (a steward, or officer,) and invited us to his house to take dinner, which we accordingly did. After the visit, he escorted us home. He has assured us of his protection, in case of any disturbance in consequence of the war. The American Vice Consul (a native) has made us many calls; the last time, his wife came with him; said they intended soon to come out and spend the day with us. They are anxious to learn the English language. Our shepherd was accosted, some two miles out on the plains, by a very wealthy land and cattle holder, to know who we were, where we came from, our object in coming, and purpose now we were here? On being informed, he appeared highly gratified, and invited him to come with his flock to graze every day upon his land, and he would give his servants charge concerning him. Our shepherd named him "Boaz."

Much friendship is manifested by the poorer class around us, and especially the children who attend my daughter A.'s school, which she commenced in two or three weeks after our arrival, with three children, and has increased to ten. At all times a day, when they see us coming, they will run to meet us, with the salutation, "Good morning! good morning!" I have had the honor of repairing an ox wagon, it being the only wheel vehicle in all this part of the country, and was brought here by a rich planter from Constantinople. Such carriages, and lighter ones, could be used on the plains to great advantage. Food and raiment may be obtained here as reasonable as in country towns in New England, although of an ordinary character; yet good enough for pilgrims, and plenty of it; the only difficulty is to procure the means to purchase groceries with, the market for produce at Jaffa being rather limited; yet we have sold some peas, beans, and other things from the garden.

Thus far I have presented the bright side of the case. I will now show the other side. We have thieves and robbers here as well as in America, yet they have not molested us in the least. There are plenty of fleas. The society is not refined. Every thing is different from American customs and manners—the unsettled state of the country, the war, &c. With their political affairs we shall have nothing to do, neither with their religion, any farther than endeavoring to be "living epistles of the grace of God, known and read of all men." This we believe to be the wisest course in the onset. We came out here to labor with our own hands, and disarm, if possible, the prejudice that now exists between Jew and Gentile, and thereby gain access to the heart, that we may sow in the words of eternal life. In this course we have not been mistaken. Even to-day, since I began to write, Mr. Levee, the chief Jewish Rabbi of Jaffa, and who owns a plantation near by us, came, and with much entreaty, requested me to take his plantation, and cultivate it, and receive all the profits, without paying any rent. He being old and poor, is not able to manage it himself. Having other engagements, and not sufficient help, I was under the necessity of declining his offer. Full well am I satisfied, that the plan that has been adopted, to cultivate the soil, is the right one, thereby affording all Jews a place of refuge, and an opportunity of learning the art of agriculture, that they may obtain a livelihood independent of their Jewish brethren, should they embrace Christianity, or be inclined to investigate its claims. I am thankful to our Heavenly Father that I am permitted to labor in this truly benevolent cause.

Mr. Jones, the gentleman that came out with us, stopped at Beirut two weeks, and obtained from Consul Smith all the papers and documents and information he could get in relation to the Artas difficulty, and likewise from the American Vice Consul at Jaffa such as he had in his possession. In company with Miss Williams, he has been to Artas and taken possession of the house, as that was the agreement of the parties, that the American donors should decide to whom their donations were given—to Mrs. Minor and associates, or to Mr. Meshullam. The decision was in favor of the former. It is evident from the documents which I have seen, that Mrs. Minor has pursued a righteous course, and is exonerated from all blame, and that Mr. Meshullam is not worthy of the sympathy or aid of the Christian community.

On the Sabbath, our little company assemble twice for religious worship.

WALTER DICKSON.

THE PRAYING COLLIER.

Dr. Joseph Stennet resided in Wales several years, and preached to a congregation in Abergravenny. There was a poor man, a regular attendant on his ministry, who was generally known by the name of Caleb; he was a collier, and lived among the hills, between Abergavenny and Hereford; had a wife and several small children, and walked seven or eight miles every Sunday to hear the Doctor. He was a very pious man; his knowledge and understanding were remarkable, considering his situation and circumstances. Bad weather seldom hindered Caleb's attendance at the house of God, but there was a severe frost one winter, which lasted many weeks, and blocked up his way so that he could not possibly pass without danger, neither could he work for the support of his family. The Doctor and others were concerned lest they should perish for want; however, no sooner was the frost broken than Caleb appeared again. Dr. S. spied him, and as soon as the service was ended, went to him and said, "O, Caleb, how glad I am to see you; how have you done during the severity of the weather?" Caleb cheerfully answered, "Never better in all my life. I not only had necessaries, but lived upon dainties the whole of the time, and have some still remaining."

Caleb then told the Doctor, that one night, soon after the commencement of the frost, they had eaten up all their stock, and not one morsel left for the morning, nor any human possibility of getting any; but he found his mind quite composed, relying on a provident God, who wanted neither power nor means to supply his wants. He went to prayer with his family, and then to rest, and slept soundly till morning. Before he was up, he heard a knock at his door; he went and saw a man standing with a horse loaded, who asked if his name was Caleb. He answered in the affirmative; the man desired him to help him take down the load. Caleb asked what it was. He said, Provision. On his inquiring who sent it, the man said he believed God had sent it; no other answer could he obtain. When he came to examine the contents, he was struck with amazement at the quantity and variety of the articles, bread, flour, oatmeal, butter, cheese, salt meat and fresh, &c., which served them through the frost, and some remaining to that present time.

The Doctor was affected with the account, and afterwards mentioned it in hope of finding out the benevolent donor; but in vain, till about two years afterward he went to visit Dr. Talbot, a noted physician in the city of Hereford. This Dr. T. was a man of good moral character, and generous disposition, but an infidel in principle. His wife was a gracious woman, and a member of the church. Dr. Stennet used to go and visit her now and then; and Dr. Talbot, though a man of no religion himself, always received Dr. S. with great politeness. As they were conversing pleasantly one evening, Dr. S. thought it his duty to introduce some thing that was entertaining and profitable. He spoke of the great efficacy of prayer, and instanced the circumstance of poor Caleb. Dr. Talbot smiled and said, "Caleb, I shall never forget him as long as I live."

"What, did you know him?" said Dr. S.

"I had but a very little knowledge of him," said Dr. T., "but I know he must be the same man you mean."

Then Dr. Talbot related the following circumstances. He said, "the summer before the hard winter, above mentioned, he was riding on horseback, as was his usual custom when he had a leisure hour, and generally chose to ride among the hills, it being more pleasant and rural. As he was riding along, he observed a number of people assembled in a barn; he rode up to the door to learn the cause, when he found, to his surprise, that there was a man preaching to a vast number of people. He stopped and observed that they were very attentive to what the preacher delivered. One poor man in particular attracted his notice, who had a little Bible in his hand, turning to every passage of scripture the minister quoted. He wondered to see how ready a man of his appearance was in turning to the places. When the service was over, he walked his horse gently along, and the poor man whom he so particularly noticed, happened to walk by his side. The Doctor asked him many questions concerning the meeting and minister, and found him very intelligent. He inquired also about himself—his employment—his family—and his name, which he said was Caleb. After the Doctor had satisfied his curiosity, he rode off, thought no more about him till the great frost came the following winter. He was one night in bed; he could not tell for certain whether he was asleep or awake, but thought he heard a voice say, 'Send provision to Caleb.' He was a little startled at first, but concluding it to be a dream, he endeavored to compose himself to sleep. It was not long before he heard the same words repeated, but louder and stronger. Then he awoke his wife, and told her what he had heard, but she thought it could be no other than a dream, and she fell asleep again. But the Doctor's mind was so impressed that he could not sleep; at last he heard the voice so powerful saying, 'Get up, and send provision to Caleb,' that could resist no longer. He got up, and called his man, bid him bring his horse, and he went to his larder, and stuffed a pair of panniers as full as he could of whatever he could find, and having assisted the man to lade the horse, he bade him take the provision to Caleb. 'Caleb, sir?' said the man, 'who is Caleb?' 'I know very little of him,' said the Doctor, 'but that his name is Caleb; he is a collier, and lives among the hills; let the horse go, and you will be sure to find him.'" The man seemed to be under the same influence as his master, which accounts for his telling Caleb, "God sent it, I believe."

THE WESTERN WATCHMAN AND THE SABBATARIANS.

Nothing is more common than for the partizans of opposing sects to prefer against one another the charge of bigotry. Those who are most forward to make the charge, however, are not always the most liberal-minded themselves; nor do they always give the best evidence in the world, that they understand the meaning of the term. As the world goes, a man who is rigidly fixed in attachment to the cause of truth will be denounced as a bigot, while one so loose as to care but little whether God or the Devil reigns, will be spoken of as a person of enlarged and charitable views. To this latter sort of liberality we make no pretensions; and if an uncompromising adherence to what we regard as taught in the Word of God renders us open to the charge of bigotry, we must be content to bear it, as others, better and holier than ourselves have had to do before.

If lexicographers are to be relied on, bigotry means an obstinate attachment to one's own opinion without sufficient reason. If one's faith or practice is expressly enjoined in the Scriptures, or is deducible therefrom by necessary consequence, he cannot be too rigid in adhering to it. His fixed, uncompromising perseverance in it is not bigotry; it is but the answer of a good conscience. In the cant vocabulary of this degenerate age, however, a stern adherence to principle, no matter how clear may be the scriptural grounds of it, is regarded as a manifestation of narrow-mindedness too insufferable to be tolerated.

Sabbatarians are bigots, if their views are not warranted by Scripture. If their views concerning the sanctity of the seventh day are but doubtful inferences from obscure passages of the Bible, and are not sanctioned by a fair construction of the language of Scripture, then let their obstinacy in the maintenance of them be set down as bigotry. But if they can show a 'Thus saith the Lord' for them, then let all candid persons judge whether the charge of bigotry does not lie with tenfold weight against those who are so obstinately wedded to their own views, that they are never willing to compare them with ours in honorable discussion, but prefer to screen them from examination by resorting to the ad captandum vulgus mode of attack, whenever they can conveniently do so.

Our hope of any candid examination of our views by editors, ministers, and leading men in the Church generally, has pretty much died out. They still mouth the terms Jewish Sabbath and Christian Sabbath, carefully telling the world how much we esteem the former above the latter, notwithstanding we have shown, over and over, that these terms are unscriptural, and that the use of them conveys most unjust ideas with respect to our Christian character. They talk of the Lord's Day, as if those who repudiate the sanctity of the Sunday had no respect for the day which the Lord claims as peculiarly his own. But when and where has their willingness been shown to have the whole question calmly and fairly discussed?

We are led to these remarks by the subjoined morceau, which we clip from the Western (St. Louis) Watchman of April 6th, a paper purporting to be of the Baptist type. It merits no particularly reply, and we notice it only because we think it probable the perpetrator expected to gain some notoriety by it, and it would be a pity to disappoint his ambition. T. B. B.

From the Western Watchman.

There is a small sect in this country called "Sabbatarians," or sometimes, "Seventh-day Baptists," whose distinguishing tenet is, that the seventh day, that is, Saturday, and not the Lord's day, ought to be observed as the day of rest, and of religious worship. Why they are called Baptists we do not know, unless it is because they practice immersion as the only baptism, which, we believe, is the fact. But, although we have occasionally looked over the articles of their weekly organ, as we have received it by exchange, most of the time since its commencement, some eight or ten years ago, we were not aware, till accidentally glancing at the last number, how very narrow and bigoted their doctrines are. The following is an extract from an editorial article on "Sabbath-breaking partnerships:"

"According to Sabbatarian theology, the keeping of the first day of the week is sin. We hold it to be sin, not because we are wanting in charity towards our first-day brethren, but because it involves a transgression of that law which says, 'The seventh day is the Sabbath; in it thou shalt not do any work.' It is sin, because, being a human tradition, it makes void the commandment of God. This is the doctrine we have proclaimed to the world. We are continuing to proclaim it, in our public discourses, in our tracts, and in all our ecclesiastical movements. We are aiming to impress it on our fellow disciples of all persuasions, that, in keeping the first day of the week, they are symbolizing with Popery, honoring a human tradition, and transgressing the divine law. This is what we are aiming at by our restricted communion; this is the object of our church organizations. For so important does this thing appear to us, that we cannot unite in commemorating the Lord's death with those who keep the Sunday, lest we should fail to bear that emphatic testimony against their practice, which we think it our duty to bear."

This we suppose to be sufficiently explicit. They "cannot unite in commemorating the Lord's death with those who keep the"—Lord's Day. It is not easy to see why such a sect should celebrate the Lord's death at all, so long as they esteem the Jewish Sabbath above the day on which he arose from the dead. Their "restricted communion" is quite needless; for it is very certain that no well informed Christian would commune with them. They may be very sincere in their belief, and very upright in their conversation, for aught we know; but their "Sabbatarian theology," according to which the keeping of the Lord's day is a sin, is too perverse to be entertained.

COMMUNION AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I ask your indulgence, and the patience of your readers, in one more article on the subject of Communion at the Lord's Table.

I readily admit, that the kind feelings of our hearts may greatly incline us to give the strongest expression of charity to such as we believe are united to Christ by faith. And I also admit, that we feel an aversion to being thought uncharitable towards our brethren who differ from us in their religious opinions. For these reasons, we may be inclined to go beyond our denominational limits, in order to gratify our own feelings, and to avoid the odium of being thought uncharitable. But I can see no real advantage resulting from the practice.

Every Christian should have some good object in view in every action of life, even in things relating to this world, and much more so in the sacred things of religion. Now, what good object is effected in promiscuous communion? If it be designed as an expression of fellowship for those with whom we communicate, then it expresses too much; for in this act we fellowship the church and its members where we may thus commune, with all their known errors and wrongs; and our action would express a falsehood. A course of Christian kindness, with the exception of this, is a more effectual and consistent method of expressing our Christian regard. Christians come into a closer and more intimate contact in an interchange of preaching, and in social meetings, than they do in the act of communing together. Our intercourse in this kind of Christian freedom is commendable, and we cannot doubt of its propriety.

Nor can it be the means of promoting Christian charity; for, on such occasions, there can be no interchange of Christian affection or sentiments, that cannot be more conveniently had at social meetings. And if, indeed, it were attended with an increase of this grace between ourselves and those with whom we may occasionally commune, it would be probably overbalanced by a loss of it in our own churches; for this practice would naturally tend to laxity in our own religious sentiments, and promote a latitudinarianism, productive of new innovations, and a servile compliance with such things as are prohibited by the word of God.

This practice cannot be plead for on the ground of necessity, while we have the opportunity of enjoying communion in our own churches as often as is useful, or would tend to promote our piety. It certainly cannot be a greater privilege to commune with those, the constitution and government of whose churches we admit to be unscriptural, than to perform this duty among those against whom no such objection can be urged.

As this sacred institution was especially designed to commemorate the sufferings of Christ, so it is evident, that if we would eat the communion of the Lord's body acceptably, we must spiritually discern it. Nor do I wish to be understood that I think we should have other objects in view, or other interests to subserve. We do not commune together in order to show our fellowship for each other. But each brother, having the same object in view, and being of one accord, and in one place, they are, as a consequence, brought into communion with each other. And as discerning the Lord's body is the main, if not the only object had in view in this ordinance, there seems no good reason for any brother's conscience to be subjected to trials on account of not performing this duty with members of other denominations. I see not why we can not discern the Lord's body as clearly when convened in our own churches, under the administration of our own ministers, and surrounded by our covenant brethren, as when we are mingled with the members of other denominations. If this is the object of communing at the Lord's table, and we gain nothing in this respect, it seems that we can have no reason for conscientious scruples in confining our communion within the limits of our own discipline.

Before closing my remarks upon this subject, perhaps I ought to notice some objections which are made against the practice of restricted communion.

We are told, it is the Lord's table, and not ours; therefore we have no right to preclude any person from coming to it. The same may be said with equal propriety of every thing else which appertains to the Lord. Baptism is the Lord's baptism, in the same sense that the communion is the Lord's table; for it is designed to show the Lord's burial and resurrection, as the communion does the Lord's death. And has not the church a right to preclude any from baptism whom it may deem unworthy? Every denomination has its terms, which must be submitted to on the part of all who are admitted to the rite. The pulpit is also the Lord's, and no church would allow of the promiscuous occupancy of it by all who might be inclined to preach in it. The same is true of the Lord's table.

It is often said, and sometimes by those whose religious standing and occupation should have raised them above it, that the language of strict communionists is this: "Stand by thyself, come not near me, for I am holier than thou." Isa. 65: 5. If this language fitly describes the sentiments and design of such as are favorable to the practice of restricted communion, we think they are unworthy of the fellowship of any class of Christians; for it indicates a degree of self-righteousness which is unworthy of the disciples of Christ. But I am persuaded that such objectors greatly mistake the sentiments and feelings of their brethren in this matter. I know not as they have ever claimed a spirituality superior to that of their brethren of other denominations. But they claim to be more consistent with the requirements of the word of God, and they wish their brethren to understand, by their practice in this particular thing, that they aim at a conformity to the apostolic exhortation, in Eph. 5: 11, to have no fellowship with what they esteem an unfruitful work of darkness, but rather to reprove it. We believe that our brethren err from the truth, in some things, which, with our understanding of the word of God, it would involve us in inconsistency if we were to fellowship them by a promiscuous communion. For this reason we have withdrawn ourselves from other religious sects, and sustain a separate church organization. We design not to implicate our brethren with insincerity, nor do we claim to be infallible ourselves.

Again, it is said, as an objection to strict communion, 'that in heaven there will be but one communion, and therefore there should be but one on earth among Christians.' I do not question the perfect harmony of the saints in heaven, but I question the appropriateness of this objection. It seems to take as an admitted fact, that all who claim communion at the Lord's table will assuredly be admitted into the assembly of the glorified saints—which is a very questionable thing. It also supposes, that the same differences will continue to be entertained in the family in heaven that exist among the various denominations of Christians on earth. This we are certain will not be the case. The errors which now separate the great body of Christians will all have been corrected; so that in heaven there will be perfect harmony in all things. The objection seems to rest upon the ground that the saints in heaven will commune together in a manner somewhat as they do on earth; which it is inconsistent to suppose. I imagine there will be no occasion for literal communion at the Lord's table in Christ's glorified kingdom. Furthermore, it seems that the objection under consideration is not made with a good grace by such as cherish a preference for a particular church. There will be but one church in heaven; and all denominational distinctions, together with their causes, will be annihilated; and the saved will be known only as the saints of God.

To conclude, if all I have said upon this subject shall have no other effect than to show that unrestricted communion is of doubtful propriety, this doubt should determine us to refrain from it. In such a case, "he that doubteth is condemned if he eat;" "for whatsoever is not of faith is sin." "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth." W. B. M.

COPARTNERSHIPS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

The probability is, that after all discussion of the innocence or sinfulness of partnerships between Sabbath-keepers and first-day keepers, as they generally are conducted, a feeling of decided dissatisfaction will continue to affect the consciences of our people respecting them. But whatever our own people may think of them, it is certain that first-day keepers will forever regard them as involving a violation of the principles we assume with reference to the Sabbath. It may be that many will apologize for the thing on one ground or another, but there is no reason to think that it will ever be really felt or believed to be consistent, at any rate, by sufficient numbers to relieve it from general condemnation. Those who are familiar with the effect of the thing on the Sabbath principles which distinguish us, see that these principles are greatly retarded in respect to their propagation by it, as well as by numerous other causes, many of which no measure of consistency, or wisdom, on our part, could prevent. In this case, as in most others, without doubt, it is much easier to find faults, than to remedy them. But it is equally evident, that faults must be discovered before they can be corrected.

I will suggest one thing, which seems to me must be observed practically among our business men, if the evil complained of is ever remedied. The thing I mean is, that our people should combine their capital and labor, to conduct all kinds of business under firms which will suspend their operations and close their establishments on the Sabbath, instead of scattering their funds all over the country, where the interests of first-day keepers so predominate as to make it impossible to have the Sabbath ever respected, and much less kept. I am aware, that it may be very difficult to succeed in some kinds of business, if the operations are suspended on the Sabbath. I think we should select other pursuits. The course our people take on this matter very generally, looks as if they thought that the observance of the Sabbath, by a business establishment of almost any kind, must be fatal to its success. That there is some reason in that idea, is not disputed, and that there is more weight in it in regard to some kinds of business than others, there is no doubt. But whatever those difficulties are, they always decrease as the appurtenances and capabilities of an establishment become more complete and ample. If an enterprise is undertaken manfully, and prosecuted vigorously, being well stocked, it will stand a chance to succeed; but if it be begun hesitatingly, and conducted doubtingly, and only half manned and half stocked, it will stand more chances to fail. But our people (it may be said) have not the means or the men to carry on extensive business. If so, then they should certainly concentrate what they have the more carefully. But is it not the fact, that we have scattered the little means we have had, among various incorporations where first-day persons, as a matter of course, from being in the majority, have filled all the lucrative positions? And has not this had a tendency to keep us poor, and lead most of our enterprising men, or at least many of them, to leave us? Has not this course been calculated generally to exclude our brethren from the opportunities of becoming experienced and competent business men? I cannot think of any thing that better illustrates the position of our people commonly in such matters, than the business of playing second-fiddle. So far, however, as our position is unavoidable from the unpopularity and limited extent of our views and practice, we should submit to it with patience and fortitude. But to carry ourselves as if we were ashamed of our principles—as if we merited to be obscure on account of them—to hide ourselves and our principles behind first-day keeping partners, clerks, or workmen, I think is not only wrong in principle, as shrinking from a manly and Christian exhibition of our principles, but is even more disastrous to the worldly interests of our people. If our brethren would take more pains—if they would consent to bear for a season the additional toil, care, and responsibility of building and managing Sabbath-keeping manufactories, mercantile establishments, trading and fishing vessels, and give proper notice when men are wanted to manage them, and liberal prices for services rendered, I think they would soon find that the strait place in which they hitherto have found themselves would widen. I think they would find the real difficulties in their way to a very satisfactory extent overcome, and many which seemed to be real, only imaginary. Then our youth would stand a better chance of employment where they could be true to conscience and duty. Then, too, some of the many who are convinced that our views of the Sabbath are correct, and who persuade themselves that they are excusable while they omit to keep it, on account of the difficulties of the undertaking, might find it practicable to conform their actual course to their own convictions. Others also, who neither know nor care what the truth may be in the case, would find themselves so associated with the question as to be more likely to become convinced of the requirements of God on them to keep the Sabbath, than they would where our principles, and interest in business, are both thrown into the back-ground by the first-day keeping character of the establishments with which we are connected.

I am aware that some may say, as it is very natural for practical men to say, "The thing looks fine in theory, and may seem very easy to those who have no experience in such things; but we know it can't be done—we have had too much acquaintance with such matters to undertake it." But I remark, that to the honor of our denomination, or at least some members of it, the thing has been tried and proved perfectly successful. In Pawcatuck, R. I., several branches of business, by as many different companies, have been established and conducted prosperously for a number of years on this plan. The machinery business carried on by J. P. Stillman & Co.; the ship-building business by Silas Greenman; the house-building business by Chas. Maxson, & Co.; the foundry business by Chas. Potter and a number of others; are instances in point. Nor have they succeeded without their share of opposition, and in some instances, plans laid for the purpose of crushing them. The ship-building business of George Greenman and brothers at Greenmanville, Ct., furnishes another illustration of the practicability of this plan. Others might be named; but these, I think, are sufficient to remove the skepticism of practical men, growing out of the idea that those who write lack experimental knowledge in such matters.

Then let our people build up Sabbath keeping establishments. I do not say they should not be in partnership with first-day keepers. I have no objection to their being in partnership with them, if they make sure the point that the Sabbath shall not be violated in conducting the business in which they are engaged. Should this rule be reduced to practice where it could be, notwithstanding it might make it necessary for us to content ourselves with small beginnings in many cases, I believe it would eventually increase the property and influence of our people as much as it would relieve the consciences of the most scrupulous of our members. Entertaining such views, no one will think strange when I say, that the course of our people generally, in becoming partners in business where they know the Sabbath will be violated constantly, is a strange and fatal blunder.

Some years since I wrote a short article on this subject, which was published in the Recorder. In that article I asked that the brethren would give their views on the question; but I do not remember that any response was made to my invitation. I regret that the subject was not then handled by "T. B. B.," or some one else, in a similar way to his late treatment of it; for though I must allow that he has laid the rod on us with a strong arm, I must also confess, that there seems to be much correctness in his views of the matter, and a great deal of justice in his way of treating it. If this discussion had been had at the time I refer to, I think it might have had a tendency to check the evil which from that time to the present has been extending, and is now the subject of complaint. I hope the discussion will do good, even at this late day.

In my article, above alluded to, I admitted that I thought a partnership with a person who would keep business going on the Sabbath might be formed, or continued, under circumstances and in view of considerations which would make it justifiable. I am of the same opinion still. But the circumstances under which, and the considerations in view of which, partnerships are formed between our people and others generally, so far as I can judge, do not approximate in the least to the idea which I had in my mind when I expressed the opinion in question. This will account for the circumstance that some have thought there was an inconsistency between the views set forth in that article and my disapproval of partnerships entered into by individuals among us since that time. This matter, I think, can be set in a clear light as follows: Suppose I say, that in my opinion a man might buy a slave, and thus become a slave-holder, under circumstances, and in view of considerations, which would justify him in so doing; as, for instance, when a man buys a slave for the very purpose of giving the slave his liberty, instead of speculating by selling him. If then a man, hearing me denounce slavery as a sin, should say to me, it is inconsistent for you to call slavery a sin, since you admit a man may be justified in becoming a slave-holder; and I should say to him, That slavery which I condemn is entered into under circumstances, and practiced for considerations, directly opposite to those which I hold would justify a man in becoming temporarily a slave-holder—every one would see that I was perfectly consistent in my statements and positions. So when I say, a partnership would be justifiable if entered into with the prospect and for the purpose of bringing the erring partner to receive the truth and walk in the liberty it gives, instead of speculating out of his continuing in the bondage of error, I suppose my consistency would be perfectly apparent.

Or, again, if a Sabbath-keeper should become a partner in business with a first-day keeper, and should make an arrangement by which he should be at no expense or derive no profit, directly or indirectly, from the labor done in the time of their business by his partner, or persons under their control, on the Sabbath, I think he could not be held as a Sabbath-breaker because the partnership premises were occupied by the agency of his partner on the Sabbath. In such a case, I think the first-day partner only would be accountable for violating the Sabbath. The Sabbath-keeping partner, in that case, would only be allowing the individual right of his partner to act on his own convictions, and for himself render an account to God for his conduct. If it be said, It would not be wise, or practical, to do business in that way, or that it would be wrong to form such a connection with violators of the sabbath, I answer, It might not be wise, but I think it could be done, though it might be ever so difficult; and in regard to the violation of the Sabbath, I think the Sabbath-keeping partner would not be in partnership in such a case, any more than he would in being (as a citizen) a proprietor in a public highway, and other proprietors should see fit to work out their road-tax, or run a line of stages upon that road, on the Sabbath. In such cases, I think responsibility ceases.

Should any doubt the correctness of my opinions, I am not disposed to be strenuous about this point. I have said these things that I might be understood. I do not advise the formation of such partnerships; but, on the contrary, I repeat, let us combine our capital and labor to rear up entire Sabbath-keeping establishments, for then our consciences will be free from harrassing doubts, our opponents cannot charge us with being inconsistent, and the course we are pledged to will be relieved from one of its embarrassments. Then, too, in those places at least where our people are sufficiently numerous to require the labors of the various kinds of mechanics, they may be able to find those among Sabbath-keepers who are competent to build houses and ships, and do such other work as they want done, without being obliged to employ, to great disadvantage, those who keep the first day, or allow them to work for them on the Sabbath

THE CLERGY ON NEBRASKA.

The clergy of New England have long considered Fast and Thanksgiving Days as suitable times to discuss in the pulpit national questions, especially in their relation to morals and religion. This year Nebraska furnished the text for a large number of fast-day sermons. Taking it for granted that very many of the three thousand clergymen of all persuasions who signed the late Memorial to Congress, would not fail to improve the opportunity of the Annual Fast, in bearing before their own congregations the solemn testimony which they had forwarded to Congress against this iniquitous consummation, the editors of the Independent addressed circulars to a number of clergymen in Massachusetts and Connecticut, inquiring the subject of their fast-day sermons, especially so far as they referred to the subjects of Nebraska and slavery. Last week that paper contained six columns of replies, from nearly a hundred ministers resident in Massachusetts, all of whom discussed the Nebraska question more or less in their sermons on fast-day. This week it promises to give similar samples of the doings of the clergy in Connecticut. Of course there was an endless variety in the modes of handling the subject; but all of them tended to the same result—all were designed to impress the people with the essential sinfulness and imminent danger of the Nebraska movement.

Mission House Burnt.—The Minnesota Democrat says that the Mission House at Lac qui Parle was consumed by fire, on Friday, the 24th March. The fire originated in the cellar, where some children had gone with a candle, and accidentally ignited a quantity of straw. There being no water at hand, it was impossible to quench the flames, and in a short time the Mission House, together with an adjoining building, was consumed. The Mission was occupied by Rev. S. R. Riggs and family, who lost nearly all their effects, clothing and provisions included. Mr. Riggs has been a devoted missionary among the Dakota Indians for a long number of years, and is well known as the author of the Dakota Lexicon, an elaborate work published by the Smithsonian Institution a few years since, by which the Dakota language, with all its peculiarities, is systematized and explained.

ANOTHER JEWISH SYNAGOGUE.

The Baptist meeting-house in Twelfth-st., N. Y., (the lot of which joins that of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in Eleventh-st.,) has recently been purchased by a "Reform" Congregation of Jews, and fitted up for a Synagogue. The building stands on a lot 75 by 100 feet, and cost, with all improvements, $48,000. On Sunday, April 2d, 75 of its 144 pews were sold at auction, and brought $28,000. The remainder are to be rented at from $15 to $40 per annum the half pew. Of the "Reforms" in this congregation, a correspondent of the Asmonean gives the following account:—

"The divine service of the Temple is made more attractive and soul-elevating by dispensing with some prayers not suitable for the present age, and especially not congenial to the feelings of an enlightened American Israelite, such prayers as were added to the ritual in time of severe persecution of our nation, in olden and more modern times, both under the despotic sway of heathen and Christian tyrants.

"Repetitions of one and the same prayer, although sometimes given in a little difference of words, are left out of the ritual.

"Such pieces of poetry, recitations and prayers, as are entirely or mixed with Chaldaic or other languages, are left out, as for instance, Eseh Meckonem, Ye-kum perkan, Pitum hacktoresh, and others; so that the liturgy is entirely in the pure Hebrew language, both prayers and psalms.

"The old melodies and the sing-song way of reciting them by the Chassan is done away with; the service is read off slowly and distinctly, accompanied by a well-trained choir and a melodious organ.

"Instead of the many Piutim, we hear a lecture every Sabbath by the Rev. Dr. Merzbarcher.

"The selling of Mizvoth and Offerings at the reading of the Thorah are entirely abolished. The reader takes the Scroll, reads the portion which is to be read on Sabbath and Festival days, in presence of the Rabbi and President, and then deposits it again in the Ark. No calling up and no notices are served, as done in other congregations, who fine their members for non-attendance, as they frequently do, to escape this involuntary tax, for such it is, although styled Free Offerings."

Revivals in New York.—The Baptist Register has intelligence of revivals in Adams, Greenville, Pavilion, and Utica. On a recent evening, Rev. D. G. Corey, pastor of the Bleecker Street church, baptized ten converts. In Greenville, forty persons have been added to the Baptist church on profession of faith, and in Pavilion thirty-two, and the good work is still advancing. From Adams, the church clerk writes:

"A series of meetings which lasted seven weeks, was commenced at our usual place of worship, and soon young converts were speaking the praises of their Saviour. Backsliders returned to the fellowship of the church, and a glorious revival was in progress in the immediate vicinity of our house of worship, where there had been, comparatively speaking, but very few conversions for a number of years. Our pastor labored almost constantly, and in connection with some of the young converts, visited from house to house, the result of which was, that many who seldom entered God's sanctuary, were seen moving to the altar of prayer, where they found peace in believing. Forty-six have been baptized, a large proportion of whom are heads of families—an increase that will materially add to the wealth and influence of the church. Thirteen stand as candidates for the ordinance, and the work of the Lord is still progressing. We have dismissed by letter, within a few months past, nearly 100. Present number, 387. The church have never been more united and harmonious than at present.

New Publications.—C. Shepard & Co., of New York, have in press, and will publish next week, "The Pearl," or "Scripture Library," in Sixteen Volumes. 32 mo., pp. 32. By H. H. Baker. The subject of each volume is as follows:—

Vol. 1. Attributes of God.
" 2. Character of Christ.
" 3. The Holy Ghost.
" 4. Fall and Depravity of Man.
" 5. Call to the Unconverted.
" 6. Evidences of Conversion.
" 7. Baptism.
" 8. The Lord's Supper.
" 9. The Sabbath.
" 10. Prayer.
" 11. Practical Holiness.
" 12. Promises to the Faithful.
" 13. Death and Resurrection.
" 14. The Final Judgment.
" 15. The Wicked.
" 16. The Saints in Heaven.

These works have been prepared with much care, and appear to be well-adapted to the biblical study of the several subjects. We may refer to them again, when we have the pleasure of examining the full series.

The Crystal Palace.—The reopening and reinauguration of the Crystal Palace takes place on Fifth-day, May 4th, with appropriate and imposing ceremonies. Addresses will be delivered by several distinguished speakers, and music of a high order is promised. The Palace opens at 8 o'clock, and any body who pleases may attend by paying twenty-five cents for admission.

The Memorial.—Another number of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial (the second number of the third volume) will be issued in a few days. It will contain a portrait of Eld. Daniel Coon; biographies of Joseph Clarke, Esq., of Westerly, Joseph Clarke, Jun., Arnold Bliss, and John Bliss; a continuation of the History of the Westerly Church, and of the History of Seventh-day Baptist Missions; post-office address of ministers, &c.

On the 27th of April there were imposing ceremonies at Danbury, Conn., on the occasion of the dedication of a Monument to General Wooster of the Revolutionary Army. It was a great day for Danbury, and passed off with happy satisfaction to all concerned.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 24.

In the Senate, a number of memorials against the passage of the Nebraska bill were presented; also one in favor of the education of boys for the duties of seamen; and a large number of other memorials of no general interest were presented and appropriately referred. A bill was introduced granting lands to Alabama for railroads. The House joint resolution directing the settlement of certain expenses incurred by the Legislature of Oregon in preparing and printing a Code of Laws, was reported and passed. A petition was presented from a number of mechanics, praying that the Homestead bill be amended so as to allow them to receive $200 each in lieu of land. The joint resolution, appropriating $100,000 to enable the President to express public gratitude to the rescuers of the passengers on the steamship San Francisco, was taken up. Mr. Gwin moved to strike out $100,000 and insert $50,000, which was agreed to, and the bill passed. The Indian Appropriation bill was then taken up, and some twenty amendments reported by the Finance Committee were adopted in a body—one appropriating $80,000 for negotiations with the Indians in Washington Territory was, after considerable debate, adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House of Representatives, after the usual opening business, resolutions passed by the Legislature of Ohio in favor of a division of that State into two Judicial Districts, were presented. A resolution was adopted, requesting the President to communicate to the House the instructions referred to by President Monroe in his annual message of December, 1823, and transmitted to the United States diplomatic agents abroad, on the subject of issuing commissions to private armed vessel, together with the responses from said Governments. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency bill. Mr. Phillips of Ala. and Mr. Harris of Miss. then addressed the Committee on the Nebraska bill.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 25.

In the Senate, numerous memorials in opposition to the passage of the Nebraska bill were presented. The bill amending the act granting preëmption rights to settlers on the Maison Rouge grant, in Louisiana, was taken up and passed. The bill granting lands to Mississippi, in lieu of deficiencies to previous grants for school purposes, was taken up, made to apply to all the States, and then passed. The bill granting land for the benefit of the indigent insane was signed by the presiding officer.

In the House, Mr. Ewing submitted resolutions calling on the President for information as to what steps had been taken by the Government for the purpose of securing our neutral rights, and whether Great Britain has assumed to act for Spain in the negotiations consequent upon the seizure of the steamship Black Warrior. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency bill. Mr. Benton of Missouri having the floor, proceeded to address the Committee in a strong speech against the Nebraska bill; and when his hour expired, quite an exciting debate was got up whether he should be allowed to finish. However, having received consent, he concluded his remarks, and the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 26.

In the Senate, a bill was passed appropriating $5,000 to purchase the portraits of the first five Presidents of the United States, painted by W. G. Stuart, to be placed in the President's mansion. The Indian Appropriation bill was then taken up, and, after a long debate on numerous amendments, the further discussion of the bill was postponed.

In the House, the Committee on Ways and Means reported the Post-Office Appropriation bill. The Judiciary Committee reported a bill regulating the salaries of District-Judges of the United States. The consideration of Mr. Bennett's bill to equalize grants of lands was then resumed, but without disposing of the subject the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency bill. Mr. Harris of Miss. resumed his remarks in opposition to the Nebraska bill. Mr. Heister of Pa. and Mr. Taylor of Ohio followed, also in opposition to the bill.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 27.

In the Senate, a memorial from the Governor and Legislature of Massachusetts in favor of a system of cheap ocean postage was presented. The bill incorporating the National Hotel Company in Washington City, was passed. The consideration of the Indian Appropriation bill was then resumed, and numerous amendments were proposed and discussed.

The House, at an early hour, resumed the consideration of Mr. Bennett's Land bill, and after a speech of Mr. Disney of Ohio, in opposition to its passage, the further consideration of the bill was postponed. The House then went into Committee of the Whole and resumed the consideration of the Deficiency bill, when Mr. Smith of Va. made a speech in favor of the Nebraska bill.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 28.

The Senate was not in session, having adjourned from Fifth-day afternoon till Second-day morning.

The House at an early hour resumed the consideration of Mr. Bennett's Land bill, which was considered until the expiration of the morning hour. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency bill, when personal explanations took place between Mr. Giddings of Ohio and Mr. Smith of Va. Mr. Sapp of Ohio then made a speech against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and in opposition generally to the Nebraska bill, when the Committee rose, and the House adjourned until Second-day.

Accident on the Sabbath.—A distressing accident occurred near Walden, Orange Co., N. Y., on Sabbath-day (Saturday,) April 22. Two sons of Marshal Wilkins, a farmer, residing in the town of Hamptonburg, went to Walkell to wash off a wagon, and drove the horse into the stream. The horse getting into deep water, and becoming entangled in the harness, the boys were frightened and jumped out of the wagon into the water; the oldest, eighteen years of age, went down immediately and did not rise. A third son, who was at the house, near by, hearing the cries of his little brother, ran to the water, and with a noble devotion, attempted to save his life by plunging into the stream after him, but unfortunately the little fellow gripped him around the neck and both went down together in the arms of death. The boys were aged 11, 14 and 18.

European News.

By the steamer Arabia, European news to April 15th, one week later, was received in New York on the 25th.

The interest this week centers more in negotiations than in fighting, although the important announcement is received of a violation of Servian territory by the Russians at Raderjevat.

The news of the declaration of war by France and England against Russia caused immense enthusiasm in Turkey.

All of the allied fleet, excepting the Charlemagne steamer, were at Varna Bay on the 26th of March. Eight French line-of-battle ships and six steamers anchored east of Varna, and further east were ten English line-of-battle ships, and six steamers. All the marines of the fleets were to land to protect Varna.

Admiral Dundas had signalized his cruisers to take, burn and destroy everything. His fleets were in communication with the Turkish land force.

On the 30th March, an important sally was made from Kalafat, and a sanguinary encounter of four hours' duration took place. The Russians were routed, and were pursued for a considerable distance.

From March 30th to April 2d, there were engagements of greater or less severity.

The Cyclops British war steamer arrived at Malta on the 7th with important news. The Turks purposely left a free passage for the Russians to Hirsova, and then attacked them in the rear. After a hard fight one half of the Russians were cut to pieces and the remainder retired across the Danube. No date is given.

From Malta, the 7th, it is stated that an English brig from the Danube, and the steamer Crescent, which was towing it, were fired into by the Russians. Another English brig, name unknown, laden with grain, was sunk by the Russian batteries on the Danube.

The Spanish Government is reported to have made satisfactory arrangements respecting the seizure of the Black Warrior.

Accounts from Jajina of the 3d, announce that the Greek insurgents had been repulsed, and Armiro had been surrendered.

From Shanghae, China, the dates are to Feb. 17th. The Chinese insurgents had evacuated Pauchau on the north entrance of the Grand Canal, and the Imperialists occupied it. The Custom House is reëstablished at Shanghae.

The China Mail says that they do not doubt the accuracy of the opening of the ports of Japan. The Japanese officials stated that all the ports might at once be considered open for supplies of wood and water, and for refitting; but that a year must elapse before any treaty or privileges of trade could come into operation.

Four Days Later.

The steamer Pacific, with four days later news, arrived at New York on the 1st inst. From Copenhagen, we have the report, that the British frigate Tribune has just returned from Admiral Plumridge's squadron, having taken five prizes and a number of prisoners. Odessa has been blockaded. Breadstuffs have advanced, and cotton was rising.

The English steamer Sampson, which had been surveying on the coast of Circassia, returned to Constantinople on March 21, bringing tidings of a complete victory gained by the Circassians over the Russians. Early in March the Circassians, provided with arms and amunition, attacked the Russians, and after a severely contested battle, drove them into their castles on the coast. These castles were surrounded, and repeatedly attacked during four continuous days. Finally the Russians, fearing to be cut to pieces, blew up their magazines, and sought shelter in their ships. The Sampson further reports that the Circassians fell on the garrisons who were retreating from two hill-forts, and put them to the sword.

California News.

California News to April 1st has been received.

About $2,000,000 in gold is brought by this arrival, and the accounts from the mines are of a highly favorable character.

The trial of Captain Watkins for his share in the fillibustering enterprise on Lower California, the arrest of the Mexican Consul, and the seizure of the ship Challenge, and a duel between two editors, are the chief topics of interest in San Francisco.

The affair of honor took place on the morning of the 21st March, between Mr. Benj. F. Washington, Editor of the Times and Transcript, and Mr. Washburn, Assistant Editor of the Alta California. The parties fought with rifles at the distance of forty paces. At the fifth fire Mr. Washburn was shot through the shoulder and seriously, though not dangerously hurt. The difficulty grew out of a newspaper discussion.

About 3,800 immigrants had arrived during the fortnight, of whom 2,500 were from the United States, and 1,173 from China.

The amount of gold dust brought down from the mines during the two weeks is very large, probably larger than any previous fortnight.

On the 13th, a party of Mexicans got into a row at Bear Valley, and three were killed and others seriously wounded.

An iniquitous bill has been introduced into the Legislature to exclude the testimony of Malays and Chinamen, in cases where a white man may be a party.

A duel was fought at Volcano Bar, on the 20th, between J. S. Landon and D. E. Hacker; the former was killed. The quarrel had its origin in the excitement about the Senatorial election, which subject has been the occasion of three duels, with a loss of two lives.

On the 18th, the Assembly passed a bill to extend till April, 1855, the law about to expire, authorizing persons claiming slaves brought to the State previous to the admission (9th Sept., 1850,) to seize the slaves, take them before a magistrate or judge, who, upon receiving satisfactory evidence that the slaves were brought hither previous to the admission, shall give a certificate to that effect to the claimant, and the victim may be taken by force out of the State. He is not allowed bail, an attorney to defend him, time to prepare for trial, a jury, or an appeal, and a Habeas Corpus would be ineffectual, only it happens that the law is and always has been unconstitutional.

Fire and Loss of Life.

About 8 o'clock on Third-day evening, April 25th, a fire broke out in the six-story building No. 231 Broadway, near Barclay-st., New York. The firemen were soon on the ground, and had just commenced operations, when a rear wall fell, and buried several of them in the ruins. Their companions immediately rushed to their rescue; and soon another wall fell upon these; causing the loss in all of ten lives, and the serious wounding of some thirty persons.

Many sad and touching scenes, and hair-breadth escapes, are related in connection with this awful catastrophe.

One of the most affecting scenes occurred in the drug store of Rushton & Clark, where several of the noble fellows were carried by their comrades as they were removed from their fiery prison house. Among them was James McNulty. He was taken out alive and carried as gently as possible in his comrades' arms and laid upon the floor, with a friend supporting his head. In a moment several physicians were kneeling around him, ready, nay, anxious to tender the utmost of their skill to save his fleeting life. They felt his pulse and applied restoratives, but it was too late. He had not only felt the crushing weight of the walls, but he had breathed the smoke and steam of the fire. His eyes were fixed, his pulse almost gone, the froth oozing from his mouth, now carefully wiped away by tender hands, for he was watched by men, rough men, but men with big hearts, who would have periled their lives to save his. It was all in vain. The physician said, It is all over—poor fellow, he is dying. Then, Oh! what a scene. Those hardy men, unrelated, perhaps almost unacquainted with the dying man, save that he was their brother fireman, pulled off their hats in token of respect, and kneeled by his side, taking his hands in theirs, while the tears rolled down their bronzed cheeks, and with their silent prayers his soul went up to God.

Charles Parks, a member of Hose Company No. 25, who was buried in the ruins about four hours, states that there was a young man lying beneath him (whose name he had forgotten) whom he heard engaged in prayer. Shortly afterward the poor fellow requested Parks to go and see his mother in Elizabeth-st., and tell her that he had died in the ruins. The poor man must have died soon after, as Parks did not hear him speak or groan afterward.

Louis Kirchner, a German, belonging to Engine Co. No. 21, was precipitated from the third story of the building, and, strange to say, was but slightly injured. He struck upon his head and hands, crushing his fire-hat. The only injury sustained was some bruises about the head, and one of his thumbs dislocated. About four weeks since, Kirchner fell from the fourth story of the iron foundry No. 65 Center-st., but sustained no injury.

James Leonard, foreman of Engine Company No 21, went into the ruins to assist in rescuing the sufferers. He was standing at the side of McKay (who was killed) at the time of the second crash. He made a spring and just cleared the falling mass. His trumpet was caught in the ruins and the rim torn off.

Burman Missions.—The Christian Chronicle prints extracts from a letter of Rev. E. Kincaid to Rev. J. H. Kennard. The following cheering paragraph is from it:—

"We have never before seen so much of God's glorious power in redeeming men. The gospel has been mighty in pulling down strong holds, and in winning men to Christ. We gave ourselves to the ministry of the word, and the Lord has opened the door of faith. During the past sixteen months four hundred and forty-one have been redeemed unto God, and buried with Christ in baptism. Fifty-four of these converts are Burmans and Shans, and nearly all of them heads of families. We have now a greater number of earnest inquirers than we ever had before. From five different villages we have had converts, and in two of these villages there is a wide spirit of inquiry. The word of God is gladly received by some twenty-five or thirty families in the villages. Yesterday, Bro. Dawson and I spent the whole day in a village about five miles off; had a pleasant meeting; three or four hopeful inquirers there, and in a village a little beyond, two good inquirers. To-day I went into the upper end of the city, and then to Kemindinge, four miles off. Many there listen to the doctrine of the cross. Twenty-four converts believe in Christ and probably will soon be baptized. One man came to the house this morning and asked for baptism, and says he has received the gospel into his heart."

Church Property for Secular Purposes.—In 1766, the Common Council of New York granted to the Brick Presbyterian Church the angular piece of ground "on the easterly side of the Commons, north of Beekman street, and next adjoining to the Vineyard." Forty pounds per annum were to be paid as ground-rent, and the property was to be subject to the following restriction: "That the said parties shall erect an edifice or church thereon, or a part thereof, for the worship of Almighty God, or use the same, or a part thereof, for a cemetery or church-yard, for the burial or interment of the dead; and shall not appropriate, apply, or convert the same, at any time for ever thereafter, to private secular uses." A large portion of the congregation who formerly attended this church having moved up town, and the property having come to be worth about a quarter of a million dollars, it is now proposed that the city take it and pay the church three-quarters of its cash value—a proposition which will probably be carried out.

Scarcity of Hay in the lumber regions of Maine is severely felt this spring. Twenty-five dollars a ton is readily paid, but sufficient cannot be obtained. Cattle will have to take to browse or die, as the snow at last accounts was still very deep.

Great Rain Storm.—The remarkable thunder storm of Thursday night, April 27, was succeeded by forty-eight hours of continuous rain, closing finally at an early hour on Sunday morning. The country has been thoroughly flooded, and much damage has been done to railroads, water-courses, and perhaps to winter crops. In Brooklyn a mass of earth was loosened from the Hights, and in its fall crushed and partially buried a dwelling-house, killing two persons and wounding several others. On the Harlem Railroad one or two important bridges were carried away. On the Hudson River Railroad, two hundred and fifty feet of the bridge over Croton River was destroyed, and in other places embankments were washed down. On the New York and Erie Railroad extensive damage was done, and seven lives were lost at Stairway, a few miles west of Port Jervis; they being carried into the river by a large quantity of earth, which loosened and gave way. The flood so far injured the Croton Dam as to cut off the usual supply of water. The Mayor of New York has issued a proclamation, calling upon all persons to observe the greatest economy in the use of water.

The Ericsson.—The noted caloric ship Ericsson, which was to be propelled by heated air, is now lying on the bottom of the Hudson River near New York. During the severe squall of Fifth-day afternoon, April 27th, she was coming up the bay from a trial trip, and while some of the firemen were heaving coal ashes out of the side port, which is a very large one, the squall struck her, heeling her down ta starboard, putting the port under water, through which she gradually filled, and sunk within 300 yards of Jersey City, with the upper decks about four feet under water. Immediately on the squall moderating, boats put off from a number of vessels anchored near, from Battery place, the Battery, and other points, and rendered all the aid possible, but the ship filled so gradually that her own and some of the vessels' boats took all hands safely ashore at Jersey City. She now lies in about eight fathoms water. There were quite a number of ladies and gentlemen on board, who had been down on the trial trip, which was a very successful one.

SUMMARY.

The Senate of the United States has ratified the Gadsden Treaty, with amendments. As amended, it gives Mexico $10,000,000, and reduces the extent of territory; it abolishes the eleventh article of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and does away with the Garay and all other private claims, but extends protection and security to the inter-oceanic communication across Tehuantepec under the Mexican grant of the 5th of February, 1853, as embraced in the Conkling Treaty.

The Chicago Tribune lately gave a variety of details to prove that there will be a large wheat crop this season in Canada, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, Ohio and Indiana, in all of which he has made personal observations. He thinks the number of acres sown is one-fifth greater than last year. In Ohio, where the wheat was drilled in, there has been very little lost by freezing. Wheat sown broadcast, and only half planted, is half dead, and the other sickly.

Now that the emigration from New England to California and Australia has in a degree ceased, the emigration to the West has recommenced at a greatly increased rate. We learn that during the present spring the number leaving by the way of the Worcester and the Western railroads is nearly double that of any previous year. In many cases whole families, apparently in comfortable circumstances, take their departure.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Tuesday, April 25, 1854, says: The steamship Texas, from Vera Cruz, has arrived at this port, bringing dates from the City of Mexico to the 18th inst. A great engagement had taken place between Santa Anna and Alvarez, in which the latter was routed. The victory of Santa Anna was celebrated at the capital with great rejoicing. A general illumination took place. Other accounts state that the victory is a ridicuious exaggeration.

The Philadelphia papers state that a passenger by a vessel at New York, from Jamaica, reports having seen a large three-masted screw-steamer, painted black outside, and with bulwarks, &c., painted yellow on the inside, lying, either at anchor or aground, near Castle Island, one of the Bahamas, on the 12th April. She was two or three miles distant, her sails were clewed up, and no one was visible on board. Strong hopes are entertained that this is the missing steamship City of Glasgow.

The Boston Post says: "As regards the Cochituate Bank, there continue to be widely different opinions. But a careful weighing of all the evidence that we can gather, indicates that, at the worst, the assets will be sufficient to pay the bills and deposits, and return 40 to 60 per cent. to the stockholders. Very many people think that the loss to the stockholders will not exceed 20 per cent. of their capital."

Col. S. E. Cuny, of Brazos, Texas, arrived in Cincinnati, O., April 19, accompanied by ten slaves, whom he had brought to Ohio for the purpose of emancipating them, according to the forms of law. As soon as the papers are made out and the proper record made, Col. C. takes his free people to Texas at his own expense, where, according to his views, he can better provide for their future well-being than in a free State.

The experiment made by Mr. A. K. Amsden, in cooking by gas, upon a stove recently invented in England, was entirely successful. Baked meats were done to a turn in forty-five minutes, water boiled in four minutes, and all with the very inconsiderable expenditure of thirty cubic feet of gas, costing eleven cents.

Stolen, April 5, from the State Bank of Indiana, at Indianapolis, $1,415 in worn but distinct notes of the Bank, by Thos. Anderson, a young Scotchman, over twenty years old, five feet five inches in stature, genteel, well dressed, good countenance, fair complexion, blue eyes, brown hair.

It is reported that the 51 persons recently arrested in the schooner Arata, near San Blas, for landing without passports, had been carried, heavily chained, to the Capital. Among the prisoners were 20 native Americans, 12 adopted citizens, and 4 Englishmen.

A dispatch dated Charleston, S. C., Wednesday, April 26, 1854, says: A most destructive fire occurred at Warrentown, Ga., on the 23d inst. Every business house in the place was burnt, together with the Court-House and papers and the Post-Office and its contents. Many of the best dwellings and a number of offices were also destroyed. The loss is estimated at about $2,000,000.

Among the speakers who will make brief, pertinent Addresses at the Inauguration of the Crystal Palace, are Elihu Burritt, (the Learned Blacksmith,) Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Rev. E. H. Chapin, Judge Wm. W. Campbell, Austin Baldwin of Conn., Richard O'Gorman, Parke Godwin, Rev. T. L. Cuyler, Erastus Brooks, L. R. Marsh, and others.

The wheat in the Genesee Valley, except upon very clayey lands, does not show signs of material injury from frost during the winter. Farmers are making calculations to plant largely this spring.

By an advertisement in the Utica papers, we observe that fifteen hundred laborers are immediately wanted on the line of the Black River and Utica Railroad. Steady employment and good wages will be given.

DIED,

In West Edmeston, N. Y., March 3d, Mr. Samuel Greenman, aged 80 years. Mr. Greenman was a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and appears to have been prepared for his change.

In Bridgewater, N. Y., April 7th, Mrs. Desire Brown, widow of the late Judge Oliver Brown, in advanced old age.

In Plainfield, N. Y., April 23d, Mr. Silas Crumb, aged 64 years.

At Rockville, R. I., of lung disease, on the 8th of April, 1854, Charles L., son of Clark and Martha Saunders, aged 4 years and 1 month. He was a very promising child; and though his parents were greatly afflicted in his death, they were comforted with the thought that > "He died before his infant soul

> Had ever burnt with wrong desires—
> Had ever spurned at Heaven's control,
> Or ever quenched its sacred fires."

In Milton, Rock Co., Wis., April 4, 1854, of inflammation of the lungs, Cornelius Truman, only son of Zacheus M. and Isabel J. Heritage, aged two years, seven months, and four days.

☞ Persons indebted to the Publishing Society will allow us to remind them, that five numbers more will complete the tenth volume of the Sabbath Recorder, and that it would be a very great accommodation to us to have what is due thereon immediately. Further, we wish to remind subscribers for the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, that the third volume of that publication is half completed, and a large part of the expense for the year incurred; it is high time, therefore, to remit subscriptions therefor. A little attention to these things, on the part of each of our subscribers, would save us a great deal of trouble.

Regular Mail Line via Stonington for Boston,

PROVIDENCE, NEW BEDFORD, and TAUNTON. Inland Route, without change of cars or detention, carrying the Eastern Mail.

The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. John G. Bowne, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily (Sundays excepted) from Pier No. 2 N. R., first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or on the arrival of the mail train which leaves Boston at 5.30 P. M.

These steamers are unsurpassed for strength, safety, speed, comfort, and elegance. The officers are experienced and attentive.

The natural advantages of this route are superior to any other. Being shorter and more direct, the trip is more pleasantly and expeditiously performed, while passengers can always rely on reaching their destination in advance of those by either of the other routes.

The COMMODORE, from New York—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. From Stonington—Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

The C. VANDERBILT, from New York—Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. From Stonington—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

N. B.—Passengers on arriving at Stonington proceed immediately by mail train to Providence, Boston, Taunton, and New Bedford, or by accommodation train from Stonington at 7 A. M.

A Baggage-Master accompanies the steamboat trains to and from Boston.

For passage, berths, state-rooms, or freight, application may be made at Pier No. 2 N. R., or at the office, No. 10 Battery Place.

Eastern Association.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Titsworths & Dunn, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order Chimes of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes, in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the Cherry Pectoral. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine Cherry Pectoral, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

Two Ways to Live on Earth.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

There are two ways to live on earth—
Two ways to judge—to act—to view;
For all things here have double birth—
A right and wrong—a false and true!

Give me the home where kindness seeks
To make that sweet which seemeth small;
Where every lip in fondness speaks,
And every mind hath care for all.

Whose inmates live in glad exchange
Of pleasures free from vain expense;
Whose thoughts beyond their means ne'er range;
Nor wise denials give offense!

Who in a neighbor's fortune find
No wish—no impulse—to complain;
Who feel not—never felt—the mind
To envy yet another's gain!

Who dream [illegible] the mocking tide
Ambition's [illegible] endeavor meets—
The bitter pangs of wounded pride,
Nor fallen power that shuns the streets.

Though fate deny its glittering store,
Love's wealth is still the wealth to choose;
For all that gold can purchase more
Are gauds, it is no loss to lose!

Some beings, wheresoe'er they go,
Find naught to please, or to exalt—
Their constant study but to show
Perpetual modes of finding fault!

While others, in the ceaseless round
Of daily wants and daily care,
Can yet cull flowers from common ground,
And twice enjoy the joy they share!

Oh! happy they who happy make—
Who, blessing, still themselves are blest!
Who sometimes spare for others' sake,
And strive, in all things, for the best!

The Object of Plowing.

The object of plowing is not fully understood and considered by the majority of those who perform the work; if it were it would be more faithfully and thoroughly done. It is not alone to kill the weeds and grass, nor even to furnish a seed-bed of fresh turned soil for planting or sowing—nor anything which looks merely to the inversion of the sod, which constitutes good plowing. Large plows turning a wide and shallow furrow, will show a large day's work—but the work is imperfectly accomplished, when the true object of plowing is considered. The chief value of plowing is the preparation it gives the soil for producing vegetation—for giving to the plants sown or planted, the elements of growth and fruitfulness. It should thoroughly pulverize and "loosen the texture of soil, and thus admit a free circulation of air and moisture, which, by chemical action, disintegrates or breaks down the stony or mineral portions of the same, so that they may be more readily dissolved and taken up by the roots."

In a soil thus plowed—thus prepared for yielding its support to vegetable life—plants can appropriate from far and near, the nutriment needed for their growth. It is dissolved and ready for their use—not hidden in unbroken clods or slumbering in an undisturbed sub-soil—but awaits their action in a friable and penetrable state, where every hungry rootlet, sent out to gather nourishment for its parent plant, may find and appropriate it. It is truly wonderful how full of roots the soil of a corn-field becomes, and if that soil is fine and deep, the deeper and closer together will the fibres permeate and intersect it. This is true of all other crops, and while the leaves and fruit depend so intimately on their vigor and extent of the roots, these facts should always be taken into consideration among the objects of plowing.

Fineness and depth of soil are requisite in order to receive the full benefit of the manures applied. It is not fertilizing food in its crude state which assist vegetation—it must in first become intimately mixed with or in fact a part of the soil. Barn-yard manure, especially, seems of little worth, while forming visible layers between the clods of a half plowed soil—it is often dry and coarse—and rather shunned than sought by the roots sent out to forage for suitable food. If a well prepared [illegible] has any strength or virtue, it will yield readily; and poor land in good tilth is often more productive than better soils less perfectly prepared. The influences of air and moisture have freedom to work, and they are no laggards in gathering means to supply the wants of vegetation.

With these hints on the object of plowing we might connect others on the process—the best means of accomplishing the object—but prefer to leave it for other pens. Will our practical farmers, who have thought and experimented upon the subject, tell us what plow, and what depth and width of furrow, taking also soil, season, team and time into consideration, most thoroughly loosens, pulverizes, and inverts the soil? This information would be of much value to the farmer, and is especially needed in the present state of agricultural progress—for taking the country at large into account, plowing is more imperfectly performed than any other part of farm husbandry. Tobacco—its Use and End.

Some years ago, a youth aged sixteen, while at college, had a severe tooth-ache; his grandmother gave him a piece of tobacco to put in his mouth to remove the pain; it did so, and from that time he chewed it for nine or ten years almost incessantly. While at college, and during a three years' course at a theological seminary, he applied himself closely, paid no attention to the rules of health, took little or no exercise, and soon after he was settled as a clergyman he became dyspeptic, and during warm weather suffered greatly from depression of spirits and mental lassitude, which seemed to incapacitate him for the proper discharge of ministerial duty; and as this duty had to be performed, he began to use brandy and water to dispel the lassitude, but only on occasions of making a public effort at first; in three or four years he felt that the use of spirits of some kind was a daily necessity. If omitted for a single day, he could not bring his mind to bear on any subject. About this time he began to find that he could not calculate with certainty upon the effects of the stimulus, as to time or amount; occasionally it almost overpowered him, and as irretrievable disgrace would have been the result, he substituted laudanum, some twenty drops thrice a day, or often enough to keep up a uniform sensation. Whenever the stimulus was about exhausted, he would begin to gape; this was the signal for a new supply. After a while, laudanum was not strong enough, and he began to take the pure opium, the amount being increased from time to time, until he found himself taking half an ounce a week, which is two hundred and forty grains, or nearly thirty-five grains a day, equivalent to three or four table-spoonsful of laudanum, which is thirty times more than a dose for a full-grown man.

"At this time," he writes, "I became greatly disordered in body, not merely through the opium, but also through the baneful habits connected therewith. I sat at my books and papers, day after day, from breakfast until past midnight, in a hot study filled with smoke from a cigar, kept perpetually alight. I suffered martyrdom from costiveness, often going nearly a week without a passage. Sometimes, too, I got into a physical state which opium would not stimulate, and then I was compelled to employ alcohol! But alcohol, acting upon opium-drugged nerves, is exceedingly apt to produce maniacal intoxication."

At this juncture, he made an effort to break up these habits. For ten days and nights he was not conscious of one moment of sleep; he was half delirious for several days; the blood in his veins felt like boiling water, and rushed with such fury to the head as to make him feel as if it would split open. For a whole year he was as feeble as a child, "a walking depository of aches and distressing sensations;" he then quitted his profession and retired to the country to study law; he was attacked with neuralgia in the head and face; this at length became unendurable, and he was advised to take morphine and quinine, which fixed the habit of using opium as firmly as ever. For two years he made no decided effort to escape from his habits, when he applied for admission into an asylum; and, for eighteen months never felt well, free from pain, "for one remembered day." Troubles came, and he returned to the use of his opiate, and continued for two years, when he found himself using sixty grains of sulphate of morphine, that is, nearly nine grains a day, or thirty-six times more than a common dose for a strong man—enough to destroy life in a few hours. He now took charge of a country parish, where he remained for two years, but found it impossible to perform his official duties, mentally or physically, without the aid of a quarter of an ounce of morphine, and sometimes more, a week, which is equal to some seven hundred grains of opium, or sixty drops to a dram or tea-spoonful, equaling ten table-spoonsful of laudanum a day, or twenty-four hundred drops; and when it is remembered that half a drop of laudanum is considered a dose for a young infant, the reader may have some idea of the magnitude of the daily potion. He is now striving to do with from half an ounce to an ounce of opium a week, averaging some five table-spoonsful of laudanum a day. Time only can tell the end of this strife; most probably it will be the gutter and the grave.

Will any young man, especially any aspirant for the ministry, after reading this statement of actual facts, dare allow the first or another particle of tobacco, or any other mere stimulant, ever to pass his lips? You are commanded to pray every day, "Lead us not into temptation;" can you thus pray as often as the morning comes, that you shall not be abandoned to the power of temptation, and yet that very day, perhaps that very hour, first expose and then yield yourself to it? If so, then it well becomes you to investigate anew "what manner of spirit ye are of."

The editor feels that any comment on the history just given would but weaken it, and he yields the young reader to the power of fact and conscience.

The Puritan Sunday.

Many of the early churches in New-England had two clergymen; one called the pastor, and the other the teacher. The order of the public services on Sunday was as follows: The congregation assembled at an early hour in the morning—never later than nine o'clock. After prayer, either the pastor or the teacher read a chapter from the sacred volume, and expounded it at length. In many of the Pilgrim churches, however, the reading of the Scriptures was not allowed for a hundred years after the gathering of the society. This was the case with some of the Boston churches, and quite an excitement was raised when the "innovation" of reading a chapter from the sacred volume was first introduced into the public religious services of the Sabbath. Next to the introductory prayer, or the reading of the Scriptures, in the New England churches, a psalm was sung, which was dictated, line by line, to the congregation. It was the practice for one of the officers of the church to read the hymns, and give out the tune. In some parishes, other persons were designated to perform this duty—for which service the party was excused from paying his poll-tax. The sermon was preached by the pastor or teacher, who had not expounded the Scriptures. The services were closed with a prayer and blessing. The one that preached did not usually take part in the other religious exercises of the occasion.

An intermission of an hour, or an hour and a half, occurred between the morning and afternoon services. For the comfort of those who came from a distance to attend worship, small houses were built, called "Sabba-day houses," for such to assemble in as lived too far to return home at noon. These houses generally consisted of two rooms, ten or twelve feet square, with a chimney in the centre between them, and a fire-place in each room. They were generally built at the expense of two or more families. On the morning of the Sabbath, the owner of these rooms deposited in his saddle-bags the necessary refreshment for himself and family, and a bottle of beer and cider. He went to the Sabba-day house, built a fire, deposited his luncheon, warmed himself and family, and at the time of worship they were all ready to sally forth, and to shiver in the cold during the morning services at the house of prayer. At noon the family returned to the Sabba-day house, where a warm room received them. The luncheon was brought out and eaten, and each in turn drank at the bottle. A blessing was invoked and thanks returned at this repast. The head of the family took notes during the morning discourse, which were read after the noon-meal. The morning sermon was discussed, as all present of the family enjoyed the utmost freedom in their remarks. Some one present prayed, and the family returned to the sanctuary.

In the afternoon, after prayer by the pastor or teacher, the Scriptures were expounded (in the churches where the Bible was allowed in the pulpit) by the one who preached in the morning, and a sermon delivered by the other. After this, baptism was administered. The minister made an exhortation, and prayed both before and after the ceremony. This ended, the contribution followed—one of the deacons making the appeal to the people. The whole congregation then arose and proceeded to the deacon's seat. The magistrates and "chief gentlemen" first, and then the elders, followed by the rest of the congregation, came up one by one, and put their offerings into a box of wood made for the purpose, and then passed another way to their seats again. The offerings were a miscellaneous collection of goods and chattels of various descriptions, besides money. From the assortment collected, the deacons made distribution to the ministers, the poor, and for other purposes. After the contribution, members were received, and cases of church discipline tried, until it oftentimes became very late. "If there was time" a psalm was sung, and the services were concluded with a prayer and blessing. The prayers were from fifty to one hundred minutes in length, and many of the sermons of the times make from a hundred to a hundred and fifty printed pages! If any one disturbed the services, he was made to stand two hours on a block four feet high, with the inscription, "A Wanton Gospeller."

After the contribution, in the second service, many of the proceedings of the sanctuary were exciting and amusing, and attracted the attention of the young folks. Oftentimes some offender was compelled to stand up and confess his crime. In many instances these persons were dressed in fantastic style. After the benediction, the ministers passed out of the building, bowing to people on both sides of the aisle, as they all sat in silence till the clergymen and their families had gone out. In the New England Colonies prayers were forbidden at weddings and funerals, but public notice was taken of such events on the following Sunday. The wedding sermons were longer than the funeral, and the young bride selected the text, which was often quite felicitous. Many a wedding sermon has been preached from the text, "Mary hath chosen that good part." When Parson Smith's daughter Abby wanted to marry 'Squire John Adams, whom her father disliked, and would not ask home to dinner, she chose for her text, "John came neither eating bread nor drinking wine, and ye say he hath a devil." This spirited damsel lived to be the wife of one President of the United States, and the mother of another! [Boston Transcript.

Sites for Peach Orchards.

Intelligent cultivators have been long familiar with the fact that the peach crop more uniformly escapes the frost on hills and in exposed localities, than in warm valleys. On hills, the wood ripens early and becomes hardy, and the frosts are not so sharp, although the cold winds may be more sensibly felt by animals and men. We have long entertained the opinion that by a selection of aspect, and the adoption of shelter, there is scarcely a county in the United States where peaches might not be raised with considerable uniformity. By shelter, we mean shelter from the sun on frozen trees, more than mere shelter from the cold.

A late number of the Granite Farmer furnishes some corroborating facts on this point, which we condense for our readers. Charles Richardson, of Manchester, N. H., who cultivates a fine garden, succeeds in raising the best peaches on a tree almost completely shaded on the south and east from the sun, the roots, body and branches being kept at a low temperature, while the other trees are barren. The fine peaches which excited so much attention at the Horticultural Society's room, in that city, raised by A. C. Heath, and O. P. Warner, were from the trees protected from the sun on the east and south-east by brick walls. A tree in Concord, on the very top of what is called "the Mountain," has borne abundantly the best of peaches for twenty-five years, stands in a very exposed situation, and is surrounded every winter by snow banks several feet deep, which, melting in the spring, keeps the fruit buds back till they are safe from the frost.

Walpole, in Massachusetts, is celebrated for its fine peaches. The Neponset runs in a northerly direction of the town; and on its low banks the peach tree grows luxuriantly, but never bears. On the gravelly ridges above the valley, the trees bear abundantly. The editor of the Farmer states that "in a distance of a fourth of a mile up one of these ridges, he passed from a peach barren to a peach plenty."

Diseases of Sheep.

Sore mouth is supposed by some to be caused by sheep eating, in the winter season, noxious weeds, for it is that period of the year generally that they are the most subject to it. A correspondent of the Cultivator thus speaks concerning it: "It generally commenced in one corner of the mouth and spread over both lips, and the lips swelled to the thickness of a man's hand. My flock consisted of about 300, and in the space of three weeks about forty died of this distemper and not one had recovered. By this time at least one-half of the remainder of the flock were attacked. It occurred to me that tar would be as likely as anything to give relief. I accordingly had my sheep all brought together, and filled their mouths, and daubed on to their lips all that could be made to stick; and, to my surprise, it effected an immediate cure. I lost but two or three after this, and these were nearly dead when I made the application. In a few days every sheep was well.

The writer, a few years since, had a few of his sheep affected in a similar way, and inasmuch as it was confined to but one flock, he attributed it to irritating weeds cut with the hay. The application of tar to their mouths was made, as described above, which effected an immediate cure. Hog's lard and sulphur will also cure the disorder.

To Test the Purity of Water.

Water, in a state of purity, can only be obtained by distillation, or as it falls in the form of rain. From its being able to hold in solution, so great a variety of substances, it is almost always contaminated with some of them. Spring water becomes impure with the various earthy matters through which it runs; and river water is still more impure in consequence of many foreign substances that find their way into it. For chemical purposes, therefore, it is necessary to distil it, by which means the impurities are separated from it. In order to ascertain the general properties of any kind of water, it may be tested in the following manner:

Pour a small quantity of it into a wine glass, and dip into it a slip of litmus paper, when, if an acid is contained in the liquid in any quantity, the paper will become red; if the water contains any alkali, the test paper will become green.

The presence of earthy matter may be ascertained by mixing a little soap with the water; if there is much earthy matter in it the soap will be curdled. This is the reason why it is impossible to form soap suds with hard spring water.

Evaporate a drop of water to be tested from a watch glass. Small rings will appear if it contains only a small portion of impure water; but a crust is seen if it held in solution much saline or earthy matter, and the crust has an ochre tint, if iron be present.

How to Raise Fruit Every Year.

If rightly understood, few trees, unless absolutely dead or rotten, need occupy ground without yielding a plenteous crop. After long and varied experiments, I gradually adopted the following mode: As soon as the winter has sufficiently disappeared, and before the sap ascends, I examine my trees. Every dead bough is lopped off; then, after the sap has risen sufficiently to show where the blossoms will be, I cut away all the other branches having none on, and also the extremity of every limb the lower part of which bears a considerable number of buds, thus concentrating the sap of the tree upon the maturation of its fruits, and saving what would be a useless expenditure of strength. In the quince, apricot and peach trees, this is very important, as these are very apt to be luxuriant in leaves and destitute of fruit. You may think this injures the trees, but it does not; for you will find trees laden with fruit which formerly yielded nothing. Of course, all other well known precautions must be attended to; such as cutting out worms from the roots, placing old iron on the limbs, which acts as a tonic to the sap, &c. Try it, ye who have failed in raising fruit.

Small Horses.

The arguments may all be in favor of great size, but the facts are all the other way. Large horses are more liable to stumble and be lame than those of the middle size. They are clumsy, and cannot fill themselves so quick. Overgrown animals of all descriptions are less useful in most kinds of business, and less hardy than those of a smaller size. If theory is to be resorted to in order to determine such questions, we suggest to the lovers of overgrown animals the following: The largest of any class are unnatural growth. They have risen above the usual mark, and it costs more to keep them in position, than it would were they more on a level with their species. "Follow nature," is a rule not to be forgotten by farmers. Large men are not the best for business; large cows are not the best for milk; large oxen are not the best for traveling; large hogs are not the hogs to fatten best, and large hens are not the best to lay eggs. Extremes are to be avoided. We want well formed animals rather than such as have large bones. Odd as it may seem to the theorist, short-legged soldiers are better on a march, and the officers say they endure hardships longer than those of longer limbs. On choosing a horse, take care by all means that his hind legs are short. If they are long and split apart like a pair of dividers, never inquire the price of the horse dealer; run for your life, and make no offer that can be taken up. Horses that are snug built are not always fast travelers. It is no easy matter to select a horse that is perfect in all points. Snug and tough horses are not fast on the road. The fastest trotters are not made for very hard service.

The Parsnip.

This is a sweet, rich, and delicious root, and alike palatable to man and beast. It is easily cultivated, whether as a garden vegetable, for the table, or as a field crop for cattle—and in a good soil, deeply ploughed and well pulverized, yields a very great crop. We have them both in garden and field, and they promise a rich return for a trifling outlay. On the islands of Jersey and Guernsey the parsnip is extensively cultivated, and it is said that all the pork on the latter island is fattened with this root, and is noted for its delicacy and flavor. We are quite confident that farmers raise too few roots for their own profit and the benefit of their stock. Cows, in the winter season, fed exclusively on dry hay, can not reasonably be expected to pay for their keeping with a good supply of milk. They should be treated to mangel wurtzel, ruta baga, carrots, and parsnips. The more of the two latter, the better. [Vermont Watch.

LAMARTINE.—The Paris correspondent of the Washington Sentinel having paid a recent visit to Lamartine, gives the following account of the poet-statesman:—

"I spent part of last evening with Lamartine. He lives in a pretty, but humble residence; and we found him surrounded by men of letters and distinguished persons of liberal views from every land. He is still a fine looking man—his appearance and manner both remind one of Henry Clay—frank, bold and fearless. We were happy to learn that his estate which was deeply involved by the sacrifices he made for his country, is now, by his own extraordinary industry and perseverance, nearly relieved from debt. Besides many other literary occupations, he is engaged on a life of Washington, which will be published within this year."

A BEGGAR'S WAKE.—At the close of last week (says the Liverpool Mercury) an old beggar-man died in a street leading out of Scotland-road. The closing moments of his life had apparently been embittered by want, and he was indebted to a poor woman in the neighborhood for the scanty supply of food which he received during his last illness. Death at last put an end to his sufferings; his benefactress made application to the parish for a coffin and made arrangements for the interment of the body at the burial-ground attached to St. Anthony's Catholic chapel. The poor woman was determined also that a "wake" should take place over the dead body, but as the absence of spiritual consolation under such circumstances makes a wake a really dead affair, it was resolved to tear up the inexpressible garments of the deceased and sell the fragments for old rags, in the hope of obtaining a supply, however small, of genuine "potteen." On proceeding to tear up the trowsers, twenty-nine real gold sovereigns were found neatly quilted in the seat, and with this windfall the mourners were able to "wake" the beggar-man in first-rate style.

RAILROADS IN INDIANA.—The State Sentinel says that Indiana has now 1,300 miles of Railroad in actual operation, 1,592 in process of construction, a good part of which is just approaching completion, and 732 miles more projected and in good part surveyed. The largest of these Roads is the New Albany and Salem, 258 miles; the oldest is the Madison and Indianapolis, 86 miles, commenced in 1838 and completed in 1847! This Road was relaid with heavy T rail in 1852, and on the 1st of Jan. last was consolidated with the Peru and Indianapolis, increasing its length to 158 miles. Of the twenty-one completed Roads, eight center in Indianapolis, which has increased her population from 2,400 in 1840 and 7,800 in 1850, to about 16,000, in 1854.

VARIETY.

There is a proposition to coin a new description of cent. It is to be of white metal, resembling silver in appearance, with a round and slightly raised edge. It is about eight-tenths of an inch in diameter, larger than a quarter eagle, and less than a twenty-five cent piece. There is not to be any hole in the coin.

Dr. Walker, of Portland, recently took from the face of a Mr. Gillmore, near the right eye, a porcupine's quill, about two inches long. Last winter Mr. G. killed a porcupine, and in eating some of the flesh got the quill into his throat, from whence it gradually worked its way to his eye, causing him considerable inconvenience in its peregrinations.

By a recent census of the city of Chicago, it appears to contain a population of 60,662. A table of the number of persons of foreign and native birth is given, by which it seems there are of the former 29,494, and of the latter 29,727. Number of colored persons 593.

A boy named Turpin who for some years past has been an imbecile, fell from an upper window of the County House at Blackwoodtown, N. J., recently, and, instead of being injured in body, he was benefited in mind—his benumbed senses being restored.

About four-fifths of the words in the English language are monosyllabic. The doxology, "From all that dwell below the skies," contains fifty words, all but ten of which are monosyllabic. The twenty-third psalm contains one hundred and seventeen words, all but twenty-two of which are monosyllabic.

The Chicago Democratic Press gives a list of the newspapers in Illinois, by which it appears that there are 154 published in the State, to wit: Dailies 20, Tri-Weeklies 7, Weeklies 118, Semi-Monthlies 1, Monthlies 4, Bi-Monthlies 1. Of the number, Chicago has 30.

The Bath Mirror states that the aggregate value of ships to be built in that city the present year, at $60 per ton, will be about two million eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars. Forty at least will be built, the average of which will be about 1200 tons.

The New Haven Courier says that hemp can be very successfully cultivated in Connecticut, and asks: "Why will not our farmers raise it more extensively? The Russian war will insure high prices for the coming and perhaps subsequent years."

The Legislature of Tennessee passed, at the last session, a law to regulate the emancipation of slaves. It provides for the transportation to the western coast of Africa of all slaves heretofore or hereafter liberated, and all free persons of color who fail to give bonds for good behavior.

A great many bills on different banks are in circulation, altered from ones to fives, and also from ones to tens. The alterations are very ingeniously done, and unless the figures and the words "ten dollars" are very carefully scrutinized, they will deceive even those who are considered pretty good judges.

There are now published in Michigan, six daily papers, two tri-weeklies, two semi-weeklies, sixty-five weeklies, seven monthlies, and one quarterly—making in all eighty-three papers, being about one to each 4,000 people in the State.

Wood cut in February is better than that cut in March, as there is less sap in it. The quantity of water in the different kinds of wood varies from 25 to 50 per cent. In a cord of green wood there is contained 1400 pounds of water.

The Legislature of Ohio passed resolutions the other day, requesting the Legislature of Pennsylvania to pass laws to enable the people of the United States to pass through that State without molestation or hindrance.

At auction in N. Y., one day last week, an original share of the Breckenridge Coal Company, being the one hundred and thirtieth part of the whole enterprise, sold for $9,300, equal to $1,200,000 for the whole property.

James Brewster, Esq., of New Haven, has generously offered to defray the expense of erecting a new Orphan Asylum in that city provided the city will furnish a lot on which to erect it.

When Summerfield was on his death-bed, he exclaimed, "Oh, if I might be raised again, how could I preach! I could preach as I have never preached before; I have had a look into eternity."

One of the bridges built by the Nicaragua Transit Company, on the road leading from Lake Nicaragua to San Juan del Sud, is made entirely of mahogany.

While in America, the proportion of persons who go to school of some kind is one to five, in Russia it is one in two hundred and twenty!

One day recently, a workman in the employ of the Messrs. Carpenter of Foxboro, by the aid of a Sewing Machine, bound and sewed the edges of one thousand straw hats.

No citizen of the United States has ever yet been convicted of treason. It is probably the only government in the world of which the same can be said.

The citizens of Norwich, Ct., have subscribed the large sum of "seventy-five thousand dollars" for the building and equipment of a Free High School in that city.

A new palace has been uncovered in the ruins of Nineveh—a palace whose beauty exceeds any yet found in Assyria.

A second steam fire engine for the Cincinnati fire department, will be finished and ready for the use of the city about the first of May.

In the N. Y. State Lunatic Asylum last year, there were 14 admissions from the effects of spiritual rapping.

The celebrated trotting horse Taconey was sold at auction the other day in Philadelphia for the sum of $3,500.

POVERTY FAVORABLE TO MENTAL CULTURE.

In considering the favorable prospects of intellectual developmeat and future usefulness to one surrounded from his earliest infancy with the adverse influences of poverty, we would not attempt to depreciate the comforts of competence, nor the blessings of wealth. The latter is the essential gift of our Creator, and for proper ends is truly desirable. But as the goddess of fortune smiles only upon a comparative few of the human family, it is highly important that we consider, whether all the glories which adorn humanity are not equally, if not more certainly, to be attained by the poor than by the rich. We conceive force of action and moral inflexibility to be the essential elements for the formation of man's character, and we farther believe, that the combined influence of these two requisites, operating in the direction of mental development and the cultivation of his moral nature, is what constitutes his true destiny. The glare of wealth, and the military glory of the most renowned in valor, darkens into obscurity before the glowing radiance reflected from intellectual and moral greatness. It is power of thought, applied to the promotion of some great and useful end, that marks the scale of human advancement. It becomes us, then, to consider, whether these characteristics are not usually engendered in that one who has inherited obscurity and want as his portion, rather than in the child of fortune.

We are designedly active creatures—our very organization denies the possibility of our remaining otherwise. The mind, the mystery of creation, is ever at work, and the great question of the young is, What shall I do? The youth of affluence, viewing in the circumstances that encircle him, nothing to awaken the energy or develop the bright faculties of his nature, places his mind and interest on the objects that glitter about him. He is free from the necessity of labor, yet he toils to be idle. Abundance and luxury corrupt his taste; and the manner of devoting his time, instead of strengthening, enfeebles his mind, and he is even rendered incompetent for a proper beginning. Though the morning of his life is brightened by the golden rays of prosperity, yet too often clouds overshadow his horizon, sorrowfully betokening that storms of adversity will yet darken upon him, ere his day is closed.

But turn with me to the abodes of honest industry, where toil is the price of the bare necessities of life. Labor is his only birthright; but that labor will make him a man. It imparts a diligence and an ever increasing energy. He conceives an idea of nobility, in working out of the rude and unshapen materials of nature his own subsistence. Success, crowning his exertions, inspires within the belief that it is the secret spring to all that is good and truly great, and nought so difficult as not to yield to its influence. Deprived of access to the flattering enchantments, to the gorgeous temptations, and to the alluring pitfalls of a deceitful world, the virtues of his moral being thrive in beauty and increase in strength. The rigorous severity of his situation is the guardian spirit that protects his life. But he, in his turn, may be prompted by impulses to enlarge his sphere of action. Not content with present abilities and influence, he knows only that others have become great, and firmly believes that no deprivation can debar his progress. He starts; difficulties are around him, and obstacles before; but through them all, high up the rugged course, hope points him to a nobler future. And why not? What endurance is too great to be borne by a sound mind and a sound body? These are the most powerful weapons nature has given us, and the more they serve us, the more they enrich themselves.

But do you, despondent and imbecile one, tell us that these pressing difficulties are insurmountable?—that the mind, unassisted by the favor of the world, cannot rise by degrees through all the powerful resistances of adversity? Would to Heaven she had thrown you in more rugged scenes, or made you of sterner material than to doubt the victory of an unflinching determination. 'Tis true, his task is great; the star of his hope may for a moment be obscured by a passing cloud; for the mass of mankind, not having one emotion in common with those aspirations that move him, he finds but little sympathy in those around. But yet, knowing that poverty with ignorance is the greatest of evils, the very misery of his situation urges him out of it. Necessity has forced him to labor, and application has become habitual; and as he yields his rude and untaught mind to a stricter discipline, his progress is at first slow, but presently a spark of intelligence gleams through the darkness that contracted his vision. Trivial success gives him new force, and for once he has reason to be encouraged. Rising impediments add fuel to his ambition; and as you feeble stream, struggling to keep its path, contends with opposing hindrances, acquiring increased strength by its own action, until it rushes with mightier power, crushing everything before it—so he, struggling with all the obstacles that can obstruct the course of intellectual progress, patiently toils till he surmounts them all, and comes forth possessed of an energy and perseverance that will make him adequate to all the future scenes of life. By no other means could he have attained that efficiency and consciousness of power, than by forcing his way through those very difficulties that rose up mountain high before him. He is now become an independent and self-acting character. He has imbibed some of the sweets of intellectual toil. He has already some conception of the nobility of mind. All future exertions will be cheerfully undertaken, and comparatively easy; for he has broken through the breakers, and his bark will be more placidly borne to her distant haven.

Though the glory of brilliant endowments is too often blighted with immorality, yet from his past discipline it is most natural that such an one, as he grows in mental strength, will put forth a moral power that great abilities and virtue can alone exert—for he started with ennobling views of humanity, and all the past has tended not only to retain them, but more perfectly to develop and enlarge them. And though poverty, without regard to moral principles, tends to greater degradation, yet that same poverty, with an active exercise of virtue, imparts nobility and candor to the human character. Look into the homes of your brown-clad husbandry, and tell me, do you not see a purity reigning there, that would spurn a seat in more glittering abodes.

And now the character whom I have been sketching you, coming up under all these influences, as he begins to radiate a more extended power, will it not be in favor of the best interests of his fellow man, and the welfare of his country? An offspring of obscurity, upon whom luxury never has exerted its effeminacy, it is most natural that the scenes of his labor will be among the middling classes, that great body of the human family most especially requiring the renovating and reforming effort of the philanthropist; for, children of the same humble parents, a sympathy will exist between them, inducing the one to labor, and the other to be benefited by his exertions.

Turn to the page of history. Behold those monuments of intellectual greatness and moral beauty; and have not the brightest of them emerged from obscurity? The bard of Avon, the glory of English literature, and we might well say the poet of all ages, more brilliant in dramatic fame than those who have preceded him, and a model for all who should come after—he too was nurtured in poverty—the degraded call-boy of a London theatre. The labors of the field could not confine the genius of Burns, whose poetical beauties and elegant simplicity we can never cease to admire; and had not the patronage of friends transported him from his humble lot, he would live with a reputation unsullied with the stain of a dissolute life. To the imprisonment of Bunyan we are indebted for the Pilgrim's Progress, containing so vivid an illustration of the sublimest truths of Christianity. But to our own immortal Franklin—perhaps we could point you to no example better illustrative of our theme than to this modern philosopher. Do you believe that he "was formed by nature alone, to sport with the thunders, and make the lightning the plaything of his leisure?" No—follow him through all the gloomy and trying circumstances of his youth, and you will find that poverty was even more distressing by the successes of adversity which attended him. An untiring diligence marked his course, and industry enrolled him among the greatest benefactors of his race. His name now stands forth, a powerful incentive to all who are struggling against like reverses.

Where now are the Franklins and Newtons of the coming age? Each generation should furnish its great men, and though you may hear nothing from them now, yet futurity will bring them forth, and could you but raise the veil that shrouds their private life, you would find them at work, studiously penetrating nature's laws—unfolding and tutoring their powers of mind, that they may one day be able to solve the great practical questions of human life.

And, born upon an American soil, are we not justified in saying, that poverty is the best dowry we can inherit? The men of the present, filling the stations of honor and usefulness, offer us a helping hand. The halls of learning and the noblest literary institutions of our country, may be made the home of the poorest youth in the land. We have not the barbarous customs of England to bind us down in obscurity; but here we are the makers of our own fortunes.

We look out upon the varied prospect of nature, and as we behold the beauteous works of our Creator, our hearts are stirred with emotions of sublimity. We see the noble oaks of the forest, as they stand unmoved amid the crash of tempests that sweep by them. We behold the glory of the departing sun mingling its last radiance with the stillness of Nature, and our minds are carried up to the contemplation of its divine Author. We hear old Ocean's roar, and with reverential awe glance upon its deep waters, as they roll with terrific grandeur to the shore. We see it sporting with the noblest of human structures, and submerging within its wrathful bosom the forms of humanity itself. We call it an object of grandeur—and truly it is, for it is emblematic of the Power that made it. But I will tell you of an object more sublime and beautiful than them all—it is to see a man, the master-piece of God's creation, once risen through all the grades of adversity, standing unharmed amid the "elements warring about him," with every part of his intellectual and moral nature developed towards perfection, and pouring out his heart's best libations on the altars of his country and his God. What must be the contemplation of such an one, as he looks back upon his earlier youth—as he traces through the trials and temptations that lowered around him, and knows that he has survived them all, and that virtue has entwined for him an immortal crown? Yes, the poor man may be great; for though he be spurned at the gilded portals of the rich, he has Heaven in his soul, and on the great scroll of eternity will appear pure and bright, glittering in the light of the sun of truth. E. M. D.

MY FATHER.

As die the embers on the hearth,
And o'er the floor the shadows fall,
And creeps the chirping cricket forth,
And ticks the death-watch in the wall,
I see a form in yonder chair
That grows beneath the waning light;
There are the wan, sad features; there
The pallid brow and locks of white.

My father! when they laid thee down,
And heaped the clay upon thy breast,
And left thee sleeping all alone,
Upon thy narrow couch of rest,
I know not why I could not weep—
The soothing drops refused to roll;
And oh! that grief is wild and deep,
Which settles tearless on the soul.

But when I saw thy vacant chair,
Thine idle hat upon the wall,
Thy book—the penciled passage where Thine eye had rested last of all;
The tree beneath whose friendly shade
Thy trembling feet had wandered forth,
The very print thy feet had made
When last they feebly trod the earth;

And thought, while countless ages fled,
Thy vacant seat would vacant stand—
Unworn thy hat—thy book unread—
Effaced thy footstep from the sand;
And widowed in this cheerless world,
The heart that gave its love to thee,
Torn like the vine whose tendrils curled
More closely to the falling tree;

Oh, father! then for her and thee
Gushed madly forth the scorching tears;
And oft, and long, and bitterly,
Those tears have gushed in later years;
For as the world grows cold around,
And things take on their real hue,
'T is sad to learn that love is found
Alone above the stars with you.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

The mail brings us "A Tract on the Character and Influence of Secret Societies, being the Circular Letter of the Harmony Baptist Association for 1853, by J. G. Stearns." The brother who sends it suggests that "its publication in the Recorder at this time would be of service to the cause of religion, and greatly assist some of our churches whose peace is menaced, and whose prosperity is retarded by the evils treated of." Presuming that the suggestion is correct, we cheerfully give it room, and solicit for it a candid perusal.

Circular Letter.

Beloved Brethren,—In addressing you in this, our Annual Epistle, we purpose to present before you the character and influence of Secret Associations. We make this selection, not because the theme is a pleasant one, but in our judgment the times upon which we have fallen imperiously demand such an exposition. Some of us could not have been made to believe, a few years ago, that an effort like this would be at all necessary again in our day. We have not forgotten the great battle which was then fought with secret societies—especially with all-powerful Free-Masonry. We still remember the distracted state of associations, churches, and neighborhoods. And perhaps in no section was the blighting influence of secret associations more disastrous than in this county. The victory, however, was won on the side of truth. Secret societies were suppressed, for a while, at least, and the churches began to have rest. But we have hardly recovered from the shock; the clangor of arms and the sound of war have scarcely died away in the distance before we are called upon to take the field, and fight that battle over again. Secret societies, like the frogs of Egypt, are coming up all over the land. In almost every little village, one, or two, or more, of these societies are in operation, throwing their bewitching and infidel influence around our young men; drawing away members of churches—male, and (we blush to say it,) even females—into their secret chambers. We think it is time to awake on this subject, or we shall soon find ourselves as much under the domination and at the mercy of secret societies as we were in the days when Free-Masonry gloried in her strength. As to the character and influence of these societies, we observe—

1st. They are suspicious. A society that shuts itself up in a secret chamber, and guards itself with a drawn sword, as some do, and conceals its principles or practices, or both, or any part of them, is, to say the least, of a suspicious character. Like the individual who moves behind the curtain and shuns public scrutiny, people will always be suspicious of him, and treat him as being unworthy of their confidence. They cannot but think of the contrast which the Spirit of Inspiration has drawn between the evil man and the good man: "For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved; but he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." Evil men generally seek to perpetrate their evil deeds in the dark. They shun the light, lest they should be reproved. Good men never wish to conceal themselves, either their principles or their practices. They love the light and come to the light, that their good works may be manifest to all, that they are wrought in God.

People wonder, and ever will wonder, why a society which is designed to do good to all, should hide itself in the dark, like rogues and villains, and not come out before the public and let his doings be openly known to all. The fact of secrecy supposes in their view something wrong; something which through fear or shame they are unwilling to have exposed. Ask members of any secret society, Is your institution designed to promote the happiness of men generally? They will readily respond in the affirmative. We then ask, Why conceal yourselves? If you are honest men, and have an honest society, and honestly intend to do good to all, why, like a band of ruffians, do you retire to a secret chamber, under bars and bolts, and door-keepers, and solemn obligations of secrecy? Why get up garret, where Tom Paine wrote his Age of Reason? The principle of secrecy on which your order is founded renders it fearfully suspicious. Common sense teaches us, that if you were honest men you would be neither ashamed nor afraid to have your deeds known to the world. We say, therefore, that secret societies, by whatever name they may be known, are suspicious.

2d. We say more—they are dangerous. No one who is at all acquainted with the history of these societies, either in our own country or in foreign countries, will question the truth of this position. Secret societies, under the name of Jacobinism, in France, it is well known, were the chief instrumentalities of overturning the government of that empire, and of introducing what is termed "the reign of terror." A distinguished French writer has said, that "secret societies in France have prevented that country from obtaining a stable government." (See N. Y. Evangelist, quoted by Michi. Herald, July 14, 1853.) Free-Masonry, a few years ago, like an imperium in imperio presented itself in hostility against the laws and institutions of our own country, and succeeded effectually in shielding kidnappers and murderers from the grasp of justice. These crimes now lie concealed beneath the mantle of masonic secrecy, and probably will until the Judgment Day. These secret clans have the greatest possible facilities for maturing and executing any secret plot they please, against the lives, liberties, and property of others. A profession of goodness in the individual members of such secret combinations, is not a sufficient guarantee for safety. We have learned to put no confidence in the good profession of men, unless that is sustained by corresponding good works. What have good men to do with a secret conclave, in a secret chamber, and at midnight hours? We know that that is not a proper place for them, and that no good motive can have drawn them there.

Any man who shall be known as an enemy to secret societies, who shall freely speak his mind against them, will pretty surely be marked by them as one who is to be dealt with according to the spirit and principles of such associations. He may feel the hand of a secret foe, opposing his interest, deranging his business, and pointing him out to the world as an unworthy and vicious vagabond, according to the oath of an Illustrious Knight. The same spirit reigns, to some extent, throughout the entire family of secret societies. They are leagued together against the interest of all such as are known to oppose them. And, therefore, a man may about as well cut off his right arm as to take an unfriendly position towards them; for it is in their power so to derange his business as to ruin his temporal interest. The writer, not long since, took occasion in a public discourse to say a few words against Odd-Fellowship. Some days after this, a member of the Order says to him, "Elder, you hurt yourself last Sabbath in what you said against Odd-Fellowship." There was meaning to this expression—"hurt yourself." But how was this done? Why, members of the Order would turn against him, and exert an influence that would be injurious to his ministerial success. They would be revenged. This was evidently intended by the expression—you hurt yourself. Is this the way that Christianity treats its opponents, seeking to injure them? This is, indeed, benevolence with a vengeance.

Any minister of the Gospel who shows himself unfriendly to these societies, and lifts his warning voice against them, stands out upon the open field, exposed to the unseen yet deadly shafts of a secret foe—a foe whose policy has ever been to strike, but conceal the hand. A mighty influence of a most malevolent character will, in many instances, operate against him, designed to reduce his congregation—to deprive him of his support—to embarrass his operations—to injure his reputation and usefulness—and finally, to compel him to retire from the field which he occupies. These things are no fiction. They are a sober and solemn reality to some, who can testify to their truthfulness from their own experience, as well as from observation.

There are others in the ministry who take a different course. Their policy is to remain silent—say nothing on the subject—give no offense. Some of them go further, and even enter these dark abodes, and identify themselves with these secret midnight clubs; join hands with them, and associate with them as a band of brothers. In so doing they avoid persecution, and secure popular favor from all this class of Jehovah's enemies. But whether their policy is wisest and best, and is such as Heaven approves, will be known in the great day of solemn reckoning. We are very sure that such ministers have assumed a fearful responsibility.

To give a practical illustration of some of these principles, we will introduce a short article from the "Puritan Recorder," headed Secret Societies and the Church.—Secret societies, organized for professedly humane and moral purposes, are often defended on the ground that these purposes are not or cannot be, answered by the church. But whether that be so or not, there is need of guarding against their stepping in and shoving out the church from its appropriate place and work. A fact of recent occurrence will illustrate what we mean. Among the persons who perished in the catastrophe at Norwalk bridge, there was a distinguished physician, who was also a member and a deacon of a Congregational church in his own town, in which there are two Congregational churches. It so happened that he was a member of the secret society of Rechabites. This Society took upon itself the work of burying him—appearing with badges and forming the procession, and making its officers the pall-bearers; and making the church and congregation, and all others, excepting the officiating clergyman, mere spectators. This society consisted mostly of men of all denominations, and of no denomination, having little or no religious sympathy with the deceased. Yet pews were set apart for them in the church, to the exclusion of the members of the church, and that too, in the time of the Sabbath worship; and that while the aisles were occupied by women, standing throughout the services of two hours and a half. Furthermore, a medical society, of which he was a member, was also represented at the funeral, by physicians from abroad, as well as by those resident in the place; and yet the funeral was assumed entirely by this secret society.

We have no wish to comment on such facts. Our readers will form their own conclusions as to the tendency of such organizations, when brought into collision with the church, but we think the church were to be blamed for allowing their deacon, and one so much respected and beloved by them, to be buried in such a manner. Christ has said—"Let the dead bury their dead." "But those who sleep in Jesus should be carried to their resting place by the living." A transaction like this is so much the more discreditable, if any considerable portion of the members of the secret society concerned in excluding the church in this instance, were themselves members of a Congregational church.

3d. Secret societies are antagonistic to the Gospel of Christ. There is a perfect contrast between them. When Jesus was interrogated by the high priest concerning his disciples and his doctrine, he answered: "I spoke openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing." To his disciples he gave the command—"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature;" and, "What ye hear in the ear, that speak ye upon the house-top." Secret societies make loud professions of benevolence and good will to all men. Are they founded upon this principle, of making themselves known to all men, and of conferring their benefits upon all, without money and without price? Far otherwise. Every thing pertaining to the existence of these societies is required by solemn obligations, and in some cases by the most horrid penalties, to be kept a secret. Their very existence depends on this secrecy. To make their principles and practices public, would at once annihilate them. On the other hand, every thing pertaining to the Gospel of Christ is required to be made public. The more public the better. On this publicity depends, in a measure, its success. There is nothing belonging to the system that is to be kept a secret. It is hence the duty, not only of ministers, but of all the disciples of Christ, to do all they can to make this gospel known to others—"To make all men see," says Paul, "what is the fellowship of the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ." The mysteries of secret societies are designed to be hid from the world—from all but the initiated, who pay their money and make solemn vows or take solemn oaths to conceal these things from others. The mystery of the glorious Gospel of Christ is designed to be made known to all men without distinction, and gratuitously. Were secret societies to adopt this principle, they could not exist a single day. Secrecy is their sole dependence for existence. What shall we think of a system of professed morality which is so perfectly antagonistic to the Christian religion? God commands his people to go forth and hold up all the principles of their faith to the gaze of the entire world. But members of secret societies are solemnly pledged to do just the reverse. We are sure, therefore, that in these societies there is something defective not only, but radically wrong.

4th. There is no call for the existence of secret societies to aid in the great enterprise of benefiting the condition of our race. We can do all that God requires of us, at home or abroad, on the land or on the sea, to glorify Him and do good to our fellow beings, without getting up secret societies. Point out a single duty that any man on earth owes to God or to his fellow men—any obligations resting on him, as a subject of law and government—any claims which God has upon him, which he cannot meet and discharge without belonging to a secret society. If such a duty, or obligation, or claim exist, show us what it is. This cannot be done. We can do our whole duty in all the relations of life—we can do it in the cause of temperance, or in any other cause, without joining a secret society. Then what can be the object of such societies? The answer is at hand—to secure some selfish or party purpose, and not to glorify God and do good to the race of man. Hence the benefits of such societies are not intended for the many—for all classes indiscriminately, but limited to the few.

THE CHINESE INSURGENTS.

The following sketch, from the pen of Dr. Medhurst, appeared in a late number of the North China Herald:—

Having obtained admission into the city of Shanghae, this afternoon, I proceeded to one of the Chapels belonging to the London Missionary Society, where I commenced preaching to a large congregation, which had almost immediately gathered within the walls. I was descanting on the folly of idolatry, and urging the necessity of worshiping the one true God, on the ground that he alone could protect his servants, while idols were things of naught, destined soon to perish out of the land—when suddenly a man stood up in the midst of the congregation, and exclaimed, "That is true—that is true! the idols must perish and shall perish! I am a Kwang-se man, a follower of Tae-ping-wang; we all of us worship one God (Shangte,) and believe in Jesus, while we do our utmost to put down idolatry; everywhere demolishing the temples, and destroying the idols, and exhorting the people to forsake these superstitions. When we commenced two years ago, we were only 3,000 in number, and we have marched from one end of the empire to the other, putting to flight whole armies of the mandarin troops that were sent against us. If it had not been that God was on our side, we could not have thus prevailed against such overwhelming numbers; but now our troops have arrived at Teentsin, and we expect soon to be victorious over the whole empire." He then proceeded to exhort the people, in a most lively and earnest strain, to abandon idolatry, which was only the worship of devils, and the perseverance in which would involve them in the misery of hell; while by giving it up, and believing in Jesus, they would obtain the salvation of their souls. As for us, he said, we feel quite happy in the profession of our religion, and look on the day of our death as the happiest period of our existence. When any of our number die, we never weep, but congratulate each other on the joyful occasion, because a brother is gone to glory, to enjoy all the magnificence and splendor of the heavenly world. While continuing here, we make it our business to keep the commandments, to worship God, and to exhort each other to do good; for which end we have frequent meetings for preaching and prayer. What is the use, then, he asked, of you Chinese going on to burn incense and candles and gilt paper; which, if your idols really required it, would only show their covetous dispositions; just like the mandarins who seize men by the throat, and if they will not give money, squeeze them severely, but if they will, they only squeeze them gently. He went on to inveigh against the prevailing vices of his countrymen, particularly opium smoking—that filthy drug, he exclaimed, which only defiles those who use it, making their houses stink, and their clothes stink, and their bodies stink, and their souls stink, and will make them stink forever in hell, unless they abandon it. But you must be quick, he adds, for Tae-ping-wang is coming, and he will not allow the least infringement of his rules, no opium, no tobacco, no snuff, no wine, and no vicious indulgence of any kind. All offenses against the commandments of God are punished by him with the severest rigor, while the incorrigible are beheaded—therefore repent in time.

I could perceive, from the style of his expressions, and from his frequently quoting the books of the Tae-ping dynasty, that he was familiar with those records, and had been thoroughly trained in that school—no Chinaman, who had not been following the camp of the insurgents for a considerable time, could have spoken as he did.

He touched also on the expenses of opium smoking, which drained their pockets, and kept them poor in the midst of wealth; whilst we, he said, who never touch the drug, are not put to such expense; our master provides us with food and clothing, which is all we want, so that we are rich without money.

I could not help being struck, also, with the appearance of the man, as he went on in this earnest strain. Bold and fearless as he stood, openly denouncing the vices of the people—his countenance beaming with intelligence, his upright and manly form the very picture of health, while his voice thrilled through the crowd. They seemed petrified with amazement, their natural conscience assured them that his testimony was true, while the conviction seemed to be strong amongst them, that the two great objects of his denunciation, opium and idolatry, were both bad things, and must be given up. He spoke intelligible Mandarin, with an occasional touch of the Canton or Kwang-se brogue. His modes of illustration were peculiar; and some of the things which he advanced were not such as Christian missionaries are accustomed to bring forward. The impression left on my mind, however, was, that a considerable amount of useful instruction was delivered, and such as would serve to promote the objects we have in view, in putting down idolatry, and furthering the worship of the true God. Another thought also struck my mind, viz., this is a class of men that can with difficulty be controlled. They must for a time be allowed to go their own way. It may not be in every respect the way which we could approve, but it does not appear to run directly counter to our objects. In the meantime, we can go on in ours, and inculcate such truths as they may forget, or state correctly what they fail to represent aright. Tae-ping-wang may thus prove a breaker up of our way, and prepare the people for a more just appreciation of divine truth, as soon as we can get the Sacred Scriptures fully circulated among them.

FORGIVENESS.

Under this head I may cite an anecdote of John Wesley, which, while it illustrates the character of this good man, teaches a sound, practical lesson on the subject now in hand. In the course of a voyage to America, Mr. Wesley heard Gen. Oglethrope, with whom he sailed, making a great noise in the cabin, upon which he stepped in to know the cause. The General immediately addressed him, saying:

"Mr. Wesley, you must excuse me. I have met with a provocation too great for man to bear. You know the only wine I drink is Cyprus, as it agrees with me best of any; I therefore provided myself with several dozens of it, and this villian (his servant who was present almost dead with fear) has drank up the whole of it. But I will be revenged on him. I have ordered him to be tied hand and foot, and to be carried to the man-of-war which sails with us. The rascal should have taken care how he used me so, for I never forgive."

"Then, sir," said Mr. Wesley, looking calmly at him, "I hope you never sin."

The General, confounded at the reproof, threw his keys to the servant, and bade him to do better in future.

Here then, is the point: If we would never forgive, we must never sin. The very proneness to sin which we find in ourselves, should be a powerful incentive to the cultivation of a spirit of forgiveness. [Religious Herald.

Who had the Daughter's Portion.—A gentleman who was collecting money to spread the knowledge of God, called at the house of a poor widow who had lost her only child, a beloved daughter. She received him gladly, and when his errand was made known, handed him a sum of money so large that it greatly surprised him, and he could not help hesitating to take it. "Indeed, you must take it all," was her reply; "I had laid it up as a portion for my little daughter, and I am determined that He who has my daughter shall have her portion also."

HEAD—HEART—HANDS.

The head is the work-shop of the mind, curiously fitted up for the express purpose of manufacturing thought. Here the mind lives and works. Thinking is nothing more nor less than manufacturing, working out thought. Telegraphic wires, commonly called nerves, lead off into all parts of the body, from this work-shop. Upon these wires dispatches are continually being sent back and forth from the great central office to all the out-stations. The world sends inward, sensations—the mind sends outward, thought.

But the head needs an assistant, a motive power. It has this in the heart. The ancients supposed the seat of affections to be in the heart; hence, they designated them by this name. We follow their example—not without reason, for there is a heart of the spirit as well as of the body. One is the great centre of the circulatory system of the body—through which rushes the crimson tide of life, giving health and animation to the body; the other is the centre of the spirit—through which rush tides of love and hate, giving spiritual activity. If there is physical derangement and disease, the pulsations of the physical heart proclaim it—if there is spiritual disease, the spiritual heart proclaims it. If the physical heart refuses to perform its functions properly, the bright crimson glow of the arterial blood becomes dark and turbid—if the spiritual heart refuses to perform its functions, then the bright and happy glow of the spirit becomes dark and threatening. If the former stands still, then physical death ensues—if the latter stands still, then spiritual death ensues. From the spiritual heart come all of the great moving forces of life.

The hands represent to us the executive powers of man—the acting forces—the doers.

These are the three great powers of man. They are like the three great forces of Government. In a well-organized government, there will be the petitioner, the legislator, and the executive. Petitioners petition—legislators consult and enact—the executive executes the enactments. Thus, also, the heart petitions the head—the head deliberates upon these petitions—the hands execute those decisions of the head that are to be carried out into activities. These petitions are good or bad as the heart is good or bad. A warm, generous, loving, noble heart, sends up to the head petitions of love and good will. A heart full of hate, of all manner of wickedness, makes similar petitions. If the head happens to be composed of a weak or servile set of faculties, its deliberations will partake of like characteristics—legislating like many of our time-serving politicians, as readily for wrong as for right. If, on the other hand, the head be strong, clear, and vigorous, its decisions may be wise and judicious. The hands, likewise, if they are feeble or unskilled, do but inefficiently execute the plans and laws of the head.

Thought is, or should be, the product of the head—love, the fruit of the heart—work, of the hands. Noble, manly, beneficial works, presuppose good hearts, clear, cultivated heads, and strong, skillful hands.

In order to realize these desirable results, it is necessary that the head, heart and hands, should all be educated—rightly, highly educated.

1. The head should be taught to think. It is thinking that gives intellectual life, strength and growth. Systematic thinking raises man in the scale of intellectual being. It gives occupation to the mind. It is an old and very truthful adage, that an idle brain is the devil's work-shop. Now, the devil has proved a very bad tenant, being a dangerous occupant, and a poor pay-master. Such occupancy is most effectually prevented, by fully, vigilantly occupying the mind ourselves with ennobling thoughts and business. The means for doing so, and thereby gaining mental culture, are numerous and varied, being scattered in great profusion throughout nature, providence, and art, and no man can hold himself guiltless, who, among such riches and incentives, gives his head up to inactivity or to evil. Pollock tells us of a man who never had a dozen thoughts in all his life. These he conned over in their accustomed order from morn till night—from youth till hoary age. He certainly must have had a very dull time of it. He had one consolation, however—that of knowing his daily, yearly occupation, which was to con over his half dozen, or dozen, old and well-worn thoughts. There are not a few at the present day, who have a like narrow range of ideas. But such a life is unworthy of a being possessing intellectual powers capable of reading and comprehending the truths continually unfolding around him—capable of eternal development and progress.

Again, there is need of minds that will make new discoveries, inventions, and applications. Improvements are needed in science and art. Many conquests are yet to be made in the physical world. The domain of the physical presents a vast field to be subdued by mind. Improvements great and varied are needed in the social, the political, the moral, and the religious worlds. There is much of wrong, and oppression, and persecution, in this earth—much of bloodshed, drunkenness, profanity, and profligacy—much of sin in high places and low. Much corruption and bribery are to be weeded from politics—many rotten planks to be removed from platforms, both political and ecclesiastical—many social evils to be eradicated—much of liberty, and truth, and righteousness, to be implanted. For all of these, strong, clear, cultivated intellects are needed.

2. The heart must be taught to love. Love is to the spiritual world what heat is to the physical. In some hearts this love is active and warming to all around—in others it is in a latent state. Opposed to love is hatred, the same as cold is opposed to heat. The great business of heart education is to develop, cultivate love—to subdue, eradicate hatred. It is by love that the world is made better. It may be made wise by the cultivation of the head—but the better must come from the heart. God, the great source and center—the radiating center of all spiritual light and warmth—of love—has filled the universe with minor spiritualities, capable of developing the same principle of spiritual life. Many of these spiritualities have let this celestial fire go down in their hearts, or have entirely extinguished it. This fire needs to be rekindled. It is necessary to warm up the spiritual world—to infuse new life and vigor. There is great need of this, in this cold, calculating world—in this world where might tramples right in the dust—where goodness wanders lonely and unnoticed, while unrighteousness sits in high places. Virtue must needs be raised from the dust, clothed in the habiliments of love, and exalted in the estimation of the people. All of the improvements heretofore referred to must be prompted, energized, by love. The world needs no more improvements in the direction of war and carnage—oppression and hate. We have already ways and means enough for afflicting, injuring, killing, our brother man. We need more for saving, improving, happifying man. In order to do this, the heart must be trained in the great school of love and good will.

3. The hands must be taught to work. A great and clear head, prepared to think great thoughts, impelled by a warm and generous heart, cannot accomplish its mission, unless the connecting links between them and the outward world are supplied—unless the active forces of the body are well trained. The hands must be taught to execute—the tongue must be taught to speak—the eyes to read—the ears to hear—the pen to write. In other words, the great media for receiving and imparting thought and affection, must be trained to perform their several duties promptly, vigorously, systematically. What good does thinking, planning, picturing do, unless they can be expressed, wrought out in substantial forms? Without this, the wisest thinking is but felicitous dreaming. If a man has a beautiful or beneficial idea or picture in his mind, he ought to give it to the world.

The world wants mind that can think profoundly, love disinterestedly, and work skillfully. It wants minds loving God with all their might, mind, and strength, and their neighbors as themselves—that can think for the world, and do with their might whatever their hands find to do. Men thus prepared, will be like the fabled Briareus, who with his hundred hands was able to fight in all directions, warding off and subduing all around him. When the world is blessed with such spirits, then, and not till then, will it be truly blessed, and take up its direct line of march towards the milenium.

THE ASSOCIATIONS.

As the time approaches for the anniversaries of the Eastern, Central, and Western Associations, it may be convenient for some who have not at hand the minutes of last year, to be informed of the times and places of meeting, and the principal appointments requiring attention.

The Eastern Association meets at Greenmanville, Ct., on Fifth-day, May 25th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Joel Greene was appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse; W. B. Gillette alternate. Thomas B. Brown was appointed to prepare and present an essay on the method of securing an able and efficient Ministry; Joel Greene to prepare an essay on the nature, power, and responsibilities of a Christian Church, and also on the propriety of our ministers baptizing persons promiscuously on profession of faith in Christ, without reference to their becoming members of our churches immediately; Halsey H. Baker to prepare an essay on the best method of conducting Sabbath Schools. The churches were requested to report in their letters the amounts contributed during the year for missionary and other benevolent purposes; also, to give the statistics of their Sabbath Schools, the names of their Superintendents, number of teachers and scholars, number of volumes in the libraries, and whatever may be of interest connected therewith. The following resolution was referred to the churches, with a request that they express their views upon it in their letters, viz: Resolved, That we deem it proper for a Deacon to administer communion in a church which has no minister or pastor.

The Central Association holds its annual meeting with the 2d Church in Brookfield, commencing on Fifth-day, June 8th, at 10 o'clock A. M. James R. Irish was appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse; Christopher Chester alternate. James Summerbell and Joshua Clarke were appointed to inquire into and report upon the condition of the churches connected with the Association from which no report has lately been received, viz: the churches at Pinckney, Diana, Richland, Newport, Preston, and Otselic. The Corresponding Secretary was instructed to open a correspondence with the Second-advent Sabbath-keepers, with a view of ascertaining the grounds of difference between them and the Association. James C. Rogers was appointed delegate to the Western Association; and it was voted, that in future delegates to sister Associations be required to present written reports, indicating the principal items of business transacted at those Associations.

The Western Association meets with the 1st Church in Alfred on Fifth-day, June 22d, Thomas E. Babcock is appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse; James Bailey alternate. Appointments were made last year for three essays to be presented at the coming session of the Association, viz: by Thomas E. Babcock on the New Birth, by James Bailey on the Immortality of the Soul, and by N. V. Hull on the Time of Commencing the Sabbath. The following brethren were last year appointed delegates to sister Associations, from each of whom written reports are expected, viz: Thomas E. Babcock to the Ohio and Virginia Associations, Hiram W. Babcock to the North-western Association, Leman Andrus to the Eastern Association, and James Bailey to the Central Association.

LETTER FROM MR. WARDNER.

From a letter of Bro. Nathan Wardner to the Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, dated Shanghae, China, Dec. 26, 1853, we copy the following interesting paragraphs.

The Sabbath question, as connected with the present Revolution in China, evidently produces some rather uneasy sensations here; though few or none are willing to enter into a thorough discussion of the question. Occasionally, however, a short skirmish is ventured.

Not long since an attack was made by the Rev. Mr. Roberts, who, as near as I could understand him, holds that the Sabbath law is binding, but that the seventh day was Jewish and typical, and therefore abolished with the other types; and that Sunday was set apart to be the Sabbath, by Christ and his apostles; still, that any day will do, one as well as another, provided it be the popular Sabbath, so as to secure union; and who seemed to think it was a pity we had not come by the way of Cape Horn, so that, without making any change in our practice in regard to the weekly return of the seventh day, we could thus have come in, so to speak, by the back door, and then all would have been union—we keeping the seventh day, and other missionaries the first day, and still all keeping the same day. Thus, having no arguments to present, according to which an honest man could come in boldly by the front door, he would fain have us come sneaking in by a back way, in order to join the popular crowd in following a tradition which makes void the law of God. It seemed useless to tell him, that it charged God with folly, to pretend that He would interpose His special authority, and with so much strictness urge the observance of a particular day, which it would be proper thus to shuffle off or on to suit the selfishness, caprice, or worldly convenience of men; and that it seemed no less disrespectful to the Saviour, if, as he pretended, He had interposed His authority to change the day. His answer to this was simply to repeat the statement.

A few days after, the subject was introduced to me by Rev. Mr. Culbertson. He at first claimed that it made no difference what particular day be observed, and for proof, stated that on the Sandwich Islands one day is observed, and on the Society Islands another; and claimed that one day is no more binding than another, unless it can be determined which of the days observed at these two places is the right one. He also argued, that the seventh day could not be kept in all parts of the earth without keeping the same absolute time; but seemed to think this objection had no effect upon the Sunday. The Cape Horn question came up next. And then he referred to "the great fact," that a change had been made, and wished to know by whom it was made, if not by Christ and his apostles, as though it belonged to us to prove that his unauthenticated assumption was not correct, or adopt it. He discarded Neander and the Church of England as reliable witnesses to show how the change was made, and quoted none on his own side, except by a sweeping assertion that included all historians, and then cut short the conversation. When asked why, if his party considered the day as non-essential, they did not adopt the one upon which all could agree, and thus secure unanimity, so desirable, he said, that those who kept the seventh day were so much in the minority that they could not be considered as affecting the general union on that subject. Notwithstanding his nonessentialism, he has lately published a catechism in Chinese, in which he insists upon the observance of the Sunday, to the exclusion of all other days.

On the 7th of December, having previously sacrificed fifty pigs as an offering to their flag, the imperialists made an attack upon the rebel's batteries at 2 P. M. While part of their fleet were storming them in front, a large body landed, in order to attack them from the rear. But instead of this, it is said, they fell to butchering the defenseless inhabitants, and being headed by the rebels, set fire to the suburbs and returned to their vessels. The wind was blowing strong from the east, which rendered the fire perfectly uncontrollable, and it swept everything before it, consuming nearly all the suburbs north of the little east gate. In this, they gained nothing, and did the rebels a special kindness. They then directed their forces against the chief battery; and two junks, manned by the most daring of them, ran up within two or three rods and commenced throwing in their missiles. The rebels concealed themselves in the houses nearest to them, and withheld their fire till the imperialists began to land, when, by throwing combustibles, they set fire to their junks, and made a deadly onset upon them with their small arms, which drove them back, and also prevented their extinguishing the fire, which soon reached their magazines, and they were blown to atoms. On the whole, the imperialists were severely beaten. I am told that they acknowledge to have lost 250 men that day, (there having been attacks made on all sides of the city at the same time,) while the rebels, it is said, only lost two. This defeat seems very much to have dispirited the imperialists, and they have done but little since, except some fruitless attempts to cut off supplies.

On Christmas night, I learn that the rebels took advantage of the thick fog and crossed the river between 9 and 10 o'clock, and surprised the imperialists at the battery they had erected nearly opposite to their own, killed some, and took six of their guns.

Bro. C. talks of sending you a printed account of the late visit of the French steamer Cassini to Nanking. It is said that Tae-ping-wong will not countenance the rebels at Shanghae, because of their idolatry, opium-smoking, &c. That they (the patriots) keep the seventh day holy, and secularize the first, is confirmed beyond all dispute. It is said they date the origin of their religion back 500 years. The latest news from the north states that they had taken "Teen-ching," and had reached the walls of Peking. They have passed through the heart of the Empire from one extreme to the other, establishing their religion and the observance of the Sabbath, and with the idea which their leader has of himself, and his followers have of him, it is not likely he would change his practice, for which he can put his finger on a "thus saith the Lord," out of respect to a human inference, contrary alike to Scripture and common sense. And when the 350,000,000 of China become Sabbatarians, what will become of the great knock-down majority argument, so much harped upon by the observers of the first day?

On the 20th, Bro. C. and myself got into the city and brought out some things that were left in his house. An eighteen-pound ball had entered one of his windows, passed through two partitions, and broke a hole through the main wall on the opposite side. Another, of a smaller size, struck the house while we were there, but did not come through. When I visited my house last, two cannon balls had entered my study, and another had come into the yard and struck within six or eight feet of the main house. Since that, another band of soldiers has made an attempt to get in. My neighbor who is left in charge told them that I was in my study, and well armed, and that it would be certain death for them to enter, which frightened them away. This will do for a specimen of Chinese skill at deception. It is said a part of the imperial army have encamped about half a mile west of my house.

A day or two since, some Catholic converts were taken by the rebels for spies, as they were hanging about the little east gate; and not knowing who they were, the rebels subjected them to some torture, as they were in the habit of doing to those whom they thus suspected. The French hearing of it, not only demanded their release, but demanded the rebel officer, second in authority, that they might punish him according to their own liking. On their demurring, the French made preparations to attack the city to-day at 12 o'clock, in case they did not comply. By the intercession of Mr. Reynolds the rebels gave up ten other men instead, who, by their head man worshiping the French flag, the affair was settled.

A PRESIDENTIAL VETO.

President Pierce has vetoed the bill recently passed by Congress, providing for the distribution of Ten Millions of Acres of Public Lands among the several States of the Union, for the express object of contributing to the subsistence, comfort, and proper medical treatment of the Indigent Insane. The veto is justified in a long Message, which takes the following positions:—1. That Congress has no constitutional power to grant the public land for any such purpose; and 2. That no gratuitous disposition of them can be made, because they are pledged for the public debt. As to the correctness, of these positions, there is much room for question; and if they are correct, Congress has certainly exercised an unwarrantable power in years past. A glance at the matter will show, that large quantities of the public lands have been donated to objects against which the constitutional objection might be raised with equal propriety and force. Grants for Schools and Universities have been made to nearly half of the States in the Union. Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri have each received more than a million of acres for this purpose, while Minnesota has received five millions, Utah and California each over six millions, New Mexico seven millions, and Oregon more than twelve millions. For Deaf and Dumb Asylums, Arkansas has received 2,907 acres, Florida 20,924 acres, and Alabama 21,949 acres. The principle involved in the proposed grant for the Indigent Insane has been extensively acted upon in years past; why should it not continue to be acted upon?

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Crystal Palace is again open to the public, under the Presidency of P. T. Barnum, and the supervision of a new and energetic Board of Directors. Its re-inauguration took place on the 4th inst., with appropriate and imposing ceremonies. A grand procession was formed in the Park, which passed through Broadway and Sixth-avenue to the Palace. At the Palace, the exercises occupied the afternoon and evening, and included musical performances of a high order. A Prize Ode, written for the occasion by William Ross Walace, was first sung, and then followed speeches by P. T. Barnum, Wm. W. Campbell, T. L. Cuyler, Horace Greeley, Richard O'Gorman, J. B. Bacon, H. W. Beecher, Mr. Henry, Mr. Sullivan, Elihu Burritt, Luther R. Marsh, Parke Godwin, and E. H. Chapin. We have room this week only for the Prize Ode and the address of Mr. Barnum.

The Prize Ode.

Lo! the transitory darkness
From our Palace floats away;
Lo! the glorious gems of Genius
Glitter in the rising day.

See again the mighty Nations
Meet and clasp each other's palms,
And by Labor's glowing altar
Lift on high according psalms.

Here behold the true Evangel!
Not from War may Earth increase;
God has stamped his shining patent
Only on the brow of Peace.

Only by the arm of Labor,
Swinging to Invention's chime,
Can the Nations build their Eden
In the wilderness of Time.

Nations! hear that mighty music
Rolling through the mountain-bars—
Planting deserts, bridging oceans,
Marrying the choral stars:

Telling that our Crystal Palace
Glorifies the joyous sod—
Making Man, with Art and Nature,
Worthy of the Builder—God!

Nations! then rejoice that darkness
From our Palace floats away,
And the glowing gems of Genius
Glitter in the light of day!

Mr. Barnum's Address.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: This is our Congress of Peace. This is our popular Coronation of Labor. We leave it to others to erect their monuments to the sword. Let them blazon in the pages of history the "fossil poetry" of names written only in human blood, and crown with laurel only the genius of destruction. We have a prouder and holier mission. Be it ours to dedicate this temple to Human Industry—to celebrate the "peaceful victories" of Toil and Skill—to place among the imperishable records of the earth this living eulogy of a wiser age and a Christian people. My friends! this is eminently a Christian as well as a Crystal Palace—for God himself was the first artificer. He ennobled Labor by His own original example; and in setting up this Altar to Universal Production, we have but made a finite copy of His infinite work, and done it up in glass and iron as a gift-hymn for worshiping Humanity. Instead of smoking battle-fields, we have the furnace with its breath of fire, moulding the stubborn iron to its work of peace. The merry ring of the anvil is our substitute for the rolling drum. The gigantic steam engine supplies us with creative thunder; while God's own lightning, snatched from its sun-path in the sky and harnessed to the car of trade, telegraphs our thoughts from pole to pole, and speaks in every tongue the eloquent language of Industry. Every age has its hero. We must have ours. The Past points to its Bonaparte and Wellington. The public debts of nations live to plead their claims to immortality as benefactors of mankind. The Present whispers in the ear of fame the names of Morse, of Hoe, of Collins, and their compeers, and it will syllable yet the name of many a gifted representative of Labor, with whom this occasion has surrounded me. These and such as these are our heroes. To Morse we owe that "still, small voice," which murmurs along its prison-wires our slightest command, and mocks at time and distance. Collins has bridged for us the turbulent ocean with a palace-way of boats. Hoe has accomplished what Archimedes could not, and in the Monster Press has given us the fulcrum and the lever that, spite of tyrant voice and hope, now moves the world; while the builders of this universe of thoughts, reserving for us the culminating glory of the age, have taught us how to bind together the East and the West in the cords of mutual production; to unite the ambition of the sweltering tropics and the shivering North in one grand effort to produce a home where every man may find a welcome for the product of his head and hands, regardless of his hue, his country, or his religion. In conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, let me mention, that the Directors of this Association, in establishing the Crystal Palace as a permanent institution, have resolved to make the occasion an interesting epoch in the memory of the inventors and artificers generally throughout the world. With this view, I have been authorized to announce the following incentives to the development of mechanical ingenuity and creative art:

The Association offers a prize of a Gold Medal, costing one thousand dollars, or its equivalent in cash, if preferred, for the most useful and valuable Invention or Discovery which shall have been patented or entered in the U. S. Patent Office during the year closing the first day of December next, provided only that the said Invention or Discovery, by specimen, model, or product, shall have, meantime, been exhibited in the Crystal Palace.

Second—A Gold Medal, costing one thousand dollars, or its equivalent in cash, to the Artist whose work, having been exhibited in the Crystal Palace during the three months closing on the first day of December next, shall be deemed most worthy of such testimonial.

Third—Five medals, costing one hundred dollars each, or their equivalent in cash, if preferred, to the five inventors whose inventions in the various departments of useful arts, patented, entered, or caveated within the year, and exhibited in the Crystal Palace as aforesaid, shall be adjudged most worthy of such testimonials next after the one adjudged most excellent as aforesaid.

Fourth—Five medals, costing one hundred dollars each, or their equivalent in plate or cash, if preferred, to the five artists whose original works, completed since the first opening of the Crystal Palace, and exhibited therein as aforesaid, shall be adjudged most worthy of such distinction next after the most excellent as aforesaid.

The ablest and most respectable Jury or Juries that can be selected shall be appointed to examine critically the several articles exhibited, and award the prizes mentioned. The Directors will proceed as early as practicable to select such Jury or Jurors, and hope to be able to announce the appointments on or before the first day of June next. I am also authorized to announce, that the Association will, in their discretion, award medals or diplomas to the exhibitors or inventors of such articles as possess merit sufficient to entitle them to such distinction. By stimulants like these, ladies and gentlemen, we hope to bring forth our new race of heroes—heroes in art—conquerors upon the battle-field of labor—victors in the sublime struggle of handicraft and intellect with ignorance and inertia. We hope to make such heroes of you, industrials, who listen to me—to immortalize you in the immortalization of our age and nation. And, if we cannot have you canonized in Notre Dame or St. Paul's, we shall find you a resting-place in the cathedral-cloisters of the human heart, wherever Genius may be known, or Science may win a hopeful idolater. (Mr. Barnum was frequently interrupted by loud applause.)

COLORED MEN OF CONNECTICUT.

A Convention of the colored men of Connecticut was held at the American Hotel in New Haven, on the 27th ult., to consider and deliberate in regard to the subject of petitioning the Legislature for the right of the elective franchise. A series of resolutions in favor of universal suffrage were adopted, and the following form of a memorial was agreed upon:—

To the Honorable House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Connecticut:—

The petition of the undersigned citizens of Connecticut respectfully shows:

1. That in the opinion of the petitioners the denial of the right of suffrage to a portion of the citizens of this State, upon the ground of color, is a vio-lation of the first principle of the Declaration of American Independence, as well as of the first article in the Declaration of Rights in the Constitution of Connecticut, since such a policy does not recognize all men as "born equal," and allows to a set of men exclusive privileges over others.

2. It is further the opinion of your petitioners, that the real interests of the colored population of this State are substantially identical with those of the white citizens; and being born on the same soil, subject to the same laws, and pursuing the same interests, they have naturally an equal right with the latter to enjoy a voice in the common government.

3. It is also the mind of your petitioners, that the policy of the Government of Connecticut toward the colored class in this State is calculated to degrade and vitiate them, by treating them as inferior beings, and thereby destroying their motives for self-respect, and removing from them as far as possible all incentive to intellectual and moral enterprise.

Wherefore your petitioners pray your honorable body to take such legal and proper measures as may be necessary to amend article 6, section 2, of the Constitution of this State, by erasing therefrom the word "white" in the first clause thereof.

HISTORY OF THE BAPTISTS.—An able and scholarly history of the Baptist denomination, which should gather and knit together the threads of centuries, and demonstrate the existence of Baptist principles and churches ever since the days of the apostles, has long been desired. Public attention has been directed to Dr. Williams and Dr. Sears as proper persons for the task; but insuperable obstacles to their engaging in the work exist. Lately, Rev. J. Newton Brown, the Editorial Secretary of the Baptist Publication Society, has been named in connection with the work. Speaking of the matter, the Watchman and Reflector says:—

"When editing the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, twenty years ago, Mr. Brown gathered many valuable data, indicating an essential identity between so-called heretics in the Middle Ages and modern Baptists. With an earnest historic zeal kindled by these accidental discoveries, he has since made it an elaborate study to find in every age, if possible, reliable evidence of the existence of Baptist churches, holding the faith and ordinances of the gospel uncorrupted by the traditions of the Fathers, or the innovations of the Papal Hierarchy. After years of patient and unwearying study, he is firm in the conviction that the goal is reached, and that he can supply the needed links in the historic chain, and trace the succession of Baptist principles from the apostolic church at Jerusalem to the churches of our own age. Having collected the necessary material, he longs for leisure to elaborate the work, and confidently hopes that the uninterrupted labor of two years would enable him to give to the denomination a Baptist History, spanning the vast chasm between the first and the nineteenth centuries."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Will some of your contributors, or other person connected with the denomination, inform your readers what is the system of church government acknowledged among Seventh-day Baptists; and whether there is a body known as a "Ministerial Conference," and what is the extent of their authority, if any such body is known to exist?

ENQUIRER.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.—This is "Anniversary Week" in New York, and, as usual on such occasions, the city is thronged with the friends and supporters of the various benevolent and reformatory Societies which center here. Our paper goes to press too early in the week for us to give to-day any account of proceedings; but in our next we shall endeavor to furnish the leading items.

GOOD EXAMPLES.—The papers of late have chronicled a good many instances of generosity on the part of churches and individuals towards their pastors. Rev. T. Starr King, pastor of a Unitarian church in Boston, recently received from one of his members a present of $1,000. Rev. Chandler Robbins, Unitarian, of the same city, had $500 added to his salary. Rev. Dr. Peabody, Unitarian, declined the offer of $500 addition to his salary, which will remain at $3,500.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The New York Colonization Journal gives a few interesting statements in regard to the present condition of the Baptist churches in Liberia. Four persons have recently been baptized into the fellowship of the church in Sinou county, and the native kings are eager to hear the gospel, and recommend it to others. The church in Bexly, Bassa county, is enjoying a revival, and ten persons have been baptized. At Millsburg, seven were awaiting the ordinance. At Cape Palmas, four have recently made a profession of religion, and some other churches have received small accessions.

Considerable feeling is reported to exist at Ellsworth, Me., between the Catholics and Protestants. The Ellsworth Herald says the trouble has been fomenting some time, and that many persons have at last come to the determination to employ none but Protestants. The Catholics have sued the Superintending School Committee for compelling their children to read the Protestant Bible in the common schools.

Rev. William R. Williams, D. D., pastor of the Amity-street Baptist church of New York, recently embarked for a few months visit to England and the continent. Dr. Williams has been for some time past in very feeble health, and the object of his going abroad is to seek restoration in an entire cessation of his public duties, and the more debilitating application of the study.

Rev. Demas Robinson, formerly an agent for Franklin College, Ia., and Rev. J. R. Johnson, late of Saugerties, N. Y., have both, by councils called to act upon their case, been charged with gross immorality, and expelled from the Christian ministry.

The first Congregational church in New London, Ct., have provided a colleague for their pastor, Rev. Dr. M'Ewen, and raised the sum of $5,500, with which to purchase an annuity of $1,000, if he so chooses.

The interesting fact is presented in a letter from the Secretary of the English F. M. Society, that the chief of the Chinese revolution employs 400 printers, who are now occupied in issuing portions of Gutzlaff's translation of the Old Testament. Letters from missionaries in China confirm the statement that a single tract was the instrument of awakening the leader of the great revolution.

The Rev. Dr. Tefft, of the Methodist Episcopal church, has been nominated as missionary to Rome, and the money has been raised by that denomination for his support. The question is now to be tested whether the Pope will tolerate a missionary in his dominions.

The Rev. Mr. Coan, of the Sandwich Islands, forwards $100 as a donation to the American Tract Society from the native Christians of his church, which is the largest in the world.

The receipts of the American Tract Society during March were $68,385; and for the year, $415,158. The gratuitous issues for the year were 65,372,000 pages; and the appropriations in cash for foreign lands, amounting to $20,000, have been paid.

Dr. Fuller, of Baltimore, baptized nine persons on the 29th ult., among whom was Rev. William Kone, who has been a highly respected preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church for nearly twenty years.

Rev. Mr. Montgomery, late pastor of the Presbyterian church in Vicksburgh, has been baptized and united with the Baptist church.

Rev. W. N. Walker, of Ohio, on the 19th ult., baptized Rev. Asa Stevens, a Methodist minister, and his wife.

A New York correspondent of Zion's Herald writes that an independent Methodist journal is about to be established in New York city.

JOHN ANGELL JAMES ON EDUCATION FOR THE MINISTRY.—The British Banner, of March 15, contains a letter to the editor, from the venerable John Angell James, on the subject of education for the ministry, from which we take a single paragraph:—

"If, as South says: 'God can dispense with some men's learning, he can still more do so with other men's ignorance.' And I hope nothing will ever induce our denomination to underestimate the value of sound learning in the ministry, or the necessity of colleges for the purpose. There are, I am happy to believe, no symptoms of this in the present day. We are likely to run into the opposite extreme, and to consider that none but scholars and philosophers can be good pastors and preachers. As a general principle, I hold that we should aim to have a learned, as well as a pious and evangelical ministry. But is it absolutely necessary that all our ministers should be trained to classical and philosophical pursuits? Do all our churches need such men? Are there not men with ardent piety, zeal, and a desire to be useful in the conversion of souls, who are too far advanced in life to enter upon a lengthened college curriculum, with any rational hope of supplementing, even by the greatest diligence, the disadvantages of their early education; but who, with good natural talents, might, under short, appropriate training, become good and useful ministers of Jesus Christ."

SUNDAY AND SUNDAY NIGHT.—In the Court of Common Pleas, at Salem, Mass., in the case of Timothy C. Kendall vs. Henry Durant, in an action on a promissory note, the defendant filed an answer setting forth that the note was made on Sunday, and therefore void; but, as the answer did not negative that the note was made after sunset on Sunday, the statute making unlawful only those secular acts done before sunset, the Court ruled the answer to be insufficient.

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Saturday, May 6, 1854, says: The steamboat Pennsylvania, while towing some barges from Schuylkill to Bordentown, about nine o'clock last evening, exploded her flue, killing William White, a fireman; Owen O'Meally, a drover boy, and two, names unknown; also nine mules and horses.

Dr. Alexander Witherspoon, an eminent physician of the U. S. Army, residing in Washington, died in that city on the evening of the 4th inst., aged 37. The deceased was the medical attendant of President Taylor during his last illness, and was a favorite practitioner with many of our distinguished public men.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 1.

In the SENATE, an act passed by the Legislature of Rhode Island, at its recent session, annulling the judgment of treason against Thomas Wilson Dorr, was read, and then laid on the table. Mr. Slidell, of Louisiana, offered a resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to suspend, at any time during the recess of Congress, the existing Neutrality Laws, should the same be deemed advisable. Mr. S., in an elaborate speech, proceeded to show the designs of England and France to appropriate Cuba to themselves, and presented evidence of a scheme for the Africanization of Cuba, and of English connivance at the introduction of slaves into the Island, and said that Louisiana could not be kept back, should a revolution break out in Cuba. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Indian Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and numerous amendments proposed and discussed.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the bill for the construction of Military Roads in New Mexico was passed. A motion was offered by Mr. Bayly of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the President be requested to communicate any correspondence with other Governments on the rights of neutrals—adopted. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on Territorial business.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 2.

In the SENATE, a number of memorials against the Nebraska bill were presented. The Indian appropriation bill was then taken up, discussed at considerable length, and the amendment making the appropriation for California Indians adopted.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Richardson of Illinois gave notice that early next week he would move a consideration of the Nebraska-Kanzas bill. Mr. Wheeler, of New York, asked consent to offer a resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy to send out one or more steam or sailing vessels to search for the steamship City of Glasgow—objected to. The House then passed the bills for the construction of roads in Minnesota, and for the relinquishment of title to lands owned and claimed by the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and for their domestication and civilization. The Committee on Territories reported a bill authorizing the people of Oregon to form a Constitution and State Government, and providing for their admission as a State into the Union—referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the several pending Territorial bills, but without concluding action thereon, the Committee rose.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 3.

In the SENATE, Mr. Pettit, from the Judiciary Committee, reported adversely on the proposition to revise, correct and codify the Statutes of the United States. The bill confirming preëmption rights to lands in the Maison Rogue Grant, in Louisiana, passed last week, was reconsidered, amended, and again passed. The Indian Appropriation bill was then resumed. Mr. Walker of Wisconsin, spoke until 1 o'clock in favor of the bill, when its further consideration was postponed. A message was then received from the President, vetoing the bill granting lands for the benefit of the indigent insane.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Walley presented a petition from the Governor and others of Massachusetts, asking the establishment of floating schools for the training of seamen; also, one from the Mayor of Boston and others, asking that the members of the army may be confined to military duties, and that civil works may be placed under the control of civil superintendents—both referred. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish the office of Surveyor-General in New Mexico, and to grant lands to actual settlers therein.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 4.

In the SENATE, numerous memorials against the Nebraska bill were presented. Mr. Sumner presented a petition from the citizens of Missouri and Wisconsin, asking the appointment of a select committee to investigate Spiritualism—laid on the table. A resolution was adopted calling for a statement of the bonds and stocks redeemed by the Treasury since the 3d of March, 1853, and the premiums paid thereon; also, one calling for a report of the exploration of the North Pacific, &c. The Senate then resumed the consideration of the President's veto of the Insane bill. Considerable debate arose as to whether the Senate should first consider the Insane or the Homestead bill. The consideration of the bill granting land to the Indigent Insane was finally postponed until Second-day next, by a vote of 29 to 20. A motion was then made to take up the Pacific Railroad bill, which was lost by a vote of 23 Nays to 20 Ayes. The Indian appropriation bill was then taken up, when Mr. Walker finished his speech.

The HOUSE, after the opening business, went into Committee of the Whole upon the bill amending the act approved September 27, 1852, to create the office of Surveyor-General of the public lands in Oregon Territory, and, after a brief debate, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House. The consideration of the bill to establish the office of Surveyor-General of New Mexico, and granting lands to actual settlers therein, was then resumed, when a long debate ensued on polygamy as practiced in Utah.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 5.

In the SENATE, no business of public interest was transacted, the day being devoted to the consideration of bills on the private calendar. After having passed twenty-two bills, postponed twenty-four, and rejecting four House bills, the Senate adjourned until Second-day.

The HOUSE, at an early hour, resumed the consideration of the bill to establish the office of Surveyor-General of Utah Territory, and to grant lands to actual settlers. The amendment under consideration was to strike out the following proviso: "That the benefits of this act shall not extend to any person who shall now or at any time hereafter be the husband of more than one wife." After considerable debate, the bill was laid aside, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

European News.

European dates to April 22d, were received in New York on the 5th inst., by steamer Africa.

The chief point of interest in the news is not some new feature of the war, or some new demonstration of Russian or Western diplomacy, but the certainty that the Spanish Government have taken steps with a view to prevent the importation of slaves into Cuba, and to regulate the general condition of the slaves in that island.

Official advices from the Danube to April 10, and private letters to 12th, state that nothing of importance had occurred. Both parties continually reconnoitre, and consequently skirmishes take place, but nothing more.

An Austrian paper of the 18th contains the following dispatch: "The important frontier town of Fokshani, in Wallachia, which had just been fortified, was destroyed by an accidental fire. All the Russian stores, provisions, and arms, also the military hospitals, fell a prey to the flames." From Vienna, the 18th, it was telegraphed that the Russians occupied Kustendje. It was also said that in evacuating the place, the Turkish irregulars set it on fire; also that they massacred all the Christians in the city. The whole story seems rather apocryphal.

From Kiel, 16th, it was stated that all the Russian ports in the Baltic are under blockade. The number of Russian merchant ships now captured amounts to ten.

A Russian merchant brig of 440 tuns was brought into Portsmouth on the 21st ult., as a prize to the revenue steam-cruiser Argus. She sailed from Lisbon with a cargo of salt on the 28th March.

Sardinia refuses to allow fitting out or provisioning privateers in her ports.

On the 13th of April, the Grand Duke and Duchess of Tuscany went through the ceremony of washing the feet of aged poor persons. A similar rite was performed by the Queen of Spain.

It is announced that gold in a pure state or largely diffused in the copper veins and quartz rocks has been found at several points in the same localities in the district of Clanwilliam, between Saldanha Bay and the Orange River, Cape of Good Hope. The Capetown journals are greatly elated at the discovery. They anticipate a sudden influx of population, with a proportionate impulse to agricultural industry, and the consequent rise in the value of land.

CAUSE OF THE RECENT CALAMITY.—The Coroner's Jury impanneled to inquire into the cause of the recent fire in Broadway, N. Y., by which eleven persons lost their lives, found as follows:—

We find that the deceased lost their lives by two distinct casualties: first, the falling of the rear wall of the front building; and second, the falling of the beams and flooring.

The first of these catastrophes was caused by the improper manner in which the said wall was built, and in which the girder it rested upon was secured; both being in contravention of the fire laws existing at the time when the building was altered.

The second catastrophe was caused by the fall of the beams and flooring upon those who were endeavoring to rescue the sufferers by the former accident. These timbers were not secured in accordance with the requirements of the fire laws in force when they were inserted in the building. The whole building was, in our opinion, a complete death-trap, and could scarcely have been more insecure and dangerous had it been constructed for the express purpose of sacrificing human life. It was, moreover, deceptive in its appearance, and on that account doubly dangerous in case of fire.

We find, further, that the parties responsible for the perilous condition of the building are, first: the architect, Charles H. Mountain, who drew the plans and specifications, and superintended the work; second, the mason, N. B. Frost, who did the mason-work, and inserted the iron girder in the rear wall; third, the carpenter, C. J. Ketchum, who put the timbers in; fourth, the lessees, Job Taber and James Bagley, for whom the alterations were made.

We believe that the fire was caused by incendiaries, and that they entered on the roof for the purpose of plunder, having obtained access thereto from the roof of an adjoining building.

SUMMARY.

D. S. McLane, of Springfield, Mass., by some unaccountable means, has lost his wife and three children. Mr. McLane left Springfield some time since to prepare a residence in Iowa, whither he designed removing his family. He subsequently wrote to his wife requesting her to come on with the family and meet him at Chicago. She is known to have left Springfield on the 30th March, since when nothing has been heard of her or the children. The husband has exhausted all his powers and means in attempting to find the lost ones.

A thirty barrel whale was struck off Southampton, L. I., on the 26th ult., but he proved a regular Tartar to his captors, staving the boat to atoms, and while he gave them this warm reception, he also cooled them off by spilling them into the broad Atlantic, severely injuring Capt. Albert Rogers, and several others of the crew. The other boats engaged in the chase speedily came to the rescue and picked them up.

Lawrence Richardson, while sitting quietly in a grocery store in Charleston, S. C., on the evening of the 23d ult., was fired upon with a gun loaded with buckshot, and instantly killed. The muzzle of the deadly instrument was not more than ten or twelve feet from the unfortunate victim. The gun was discharged through an open door. The murderer immediately escaped, and has not thus far been taken.

In France, the tax books for the year 1854 show that 12,000,000 of the inhabitants, or one in three, own land, with or without buildings upon it. It may be safely said, that in no country, and at no period, has there ever been such a general subdivision of the soil. Some of the lots are very small, but nevertheless the holder is a landed proprietor, and proud of the title.

The N. Y. Tribune of May 8th, says: It is formally announced in the House and in the administration organ at Washington, that an attempt will be made early in this week to take up the Nebraska bill with a view to its prompt passage.

From China news has come that the opening of Japan has been accomplished—by the Russians. While Commodore Perry was waiting the expiration of six months to receive an answer to the letter he bore to the Emperor, a Russian fleet repaired to the spot and received assurances that the ports should be opened to the commerce of all nations, but that so radical a change of policy would take time, and could not be carried out under a year.

A wretch in Chautauque county sold a dog to the father of a family, after he knew he had been bitten by a rabid animal. A few days after, he became mad, and bit a child of 18 months. The little creature soon became ravingly delirious, lacerating its own flesh, and dying in horrible convulsions. The same dog bit two other children, who were immediately conveyed to Buffalo for medical treatment. The monster who sold the dog has been arrested.

Another attempt is to be made to recover the money belonging to the American Express Company from the wreck of the steamer Atlantic, which was sunk in Lake Erie. Mr. Green, the expert diver, whose exploits on the lake have rendered him a well-known character throughout the Union, is about making another attempt to get up the money.

There is no small excitement at Louisville, Ky., growing out of the trial and acquittal of Matt. F. Ward, charged with the murder of Prof. Butler. The common people generally regard the acquittal as a result of the overpowering influence of wealth and aristocracy upon the court. Ward was burnt in effigy before his own house, and a public demonstration against him was made.

The schooner King-Fisher, from Port-au-Prince, bring advices to the 14th ult. The Emperor (Solouque) was enlisting men for the army and making great preparations with his fleet and army for the invasion of Dominica both by sea and land. Operations would commence immediately after the holidays were over, which would be about the 1st of May.

The inhabitants of Oxford, Chenango Co., have determined to issue bonds for $50,000 for the benefit of the Utica and Binghamton Railroad. Two-thirds of the inhabitants have already given their written consent, with a prospect that unanimous consent will be given for the issuing the bonds.

The last State Election in Ohio resulted in a signal defeat of the advocates of Prohibition. An immense amount of Distillation has for a generation been carried on in Ohio, while brewing, cider-making, and (more recently) wine-making, are very extensively prosecuted there.

Some of the Liverpool vessels about to be dispatched to Australia, will carry bullion safes, and be fully armed. The cause of this is probably the rumor that has been spread lately, of Russian vessels of war having been seen cruising in the neighborhood of Madeira.

In five consecutive years, ending in 1849, the estimated production of guns in Birmingham was 1,324,329 stand of arms, an average of 274,865 a year, and the gun-makers are fully prepared to produce a larger number of arms, if required.

At one stall in Washington Market, only 16 feet square, a yearly business of seven hundred thousand dollars is transacted. One dealer in eggs sold four hundred thousand dollars' worth in one year. This statement was made before a committee of the Common Council.

Two men, brothers, by the name of Jones, were killed by lightning, about five miles from Pekin, Illinois, on the 25th ult. They were in a field plowing, when a storm came up and they took refuge under a tree, which was struck, and both the men killed.

The people of Burlington, Vt., were favored with about eight inches of snow on the 28th ult. The Free Press says: "Had none of it melted as it fell, the fall would, we think, have been over a foot, or deeper than any fall in this place during the past winter."

MARRIED,

At Potter Hill, R. I., on the 30th of April, by Eld. O. M. Lewis, Mr. CHARLES H. NICHOLS, of Hopkinton, to Miss HARRIET C. SAUNDERS, of Westerly.

In Hornellsville, N. Y., May 4th, by Eld. H. P. Burdick, Mr. CHESTER SHAW, of Alfred, to Miss SALINA SATTERLEE, of Hornellsville.

☞ In our marriage notices last week, the name of Emma S. Langworthy was from mistake in the copy printed Emma S. Stillman.

DIED,

In Bolivar, N. Y., April 26, 1854, of consumption, ELIZA HAMILTON, aged 37 years. She was the wife of Bro. George Hamilton, and daughter of Bro. James Maxson, of Bolivar, Allegany Co., N. Y. She experienced religion when she was young, and her life corresponded with her profession. Sister Hamilton was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Richburgh, and was loved by all. During her last sickness, she was calm, and manifested a Christian patience not often witnessed. A short time before her death she listened to the reading of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, and after prayer she said that chapter was a great comfort to her. She could repeat the most of it. When lying on her bed she thought it over and felt reconciled. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord." L. A.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., April 27th, Deacon PARDON COON, aged 78 years. Deacon Coon was among the early inhabitants of DeRuyter, and near forty years since embraced religion and united with the people of his choice, among whom he maintained his fraternal relation till the visibility of that relation was dissolved by death. Being naturally diffident, and a man of few words, he was not as forward in the social and public devotions of the church as many who have borne the office of deacon, yet he manifested an undeviating interest in whatever pertained to the welfare of Zion, and by a spotless life showed that the hopes of his heart were anchored by Christ within the veil. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Matt. 5: 8. J. R. I.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 2d inst., of pulmonary consumption, Mr. DAVID S. MAXSON, aged 25 years. Bro. Maxson was a young man of promise, and had for two or three years past been making flattering advancement in literary attainments. But while connected with the school at Alfred, N. Y., during the past winter, his health, which had not been good for some time previous, so far failed him that he was compelled to leave his studies and return home. From that time his health has gradually declined, until he fell a victim of disease. He professed religion in early youth, and united with the 1st Hopkinton Church, where he has ever since maintained more than an ordinary devotion and faithfulness to the cause of Christ. His last hours were characterized by patience and resignation to death. C. M. L.

In Otselic, Chenango Co., N. Y., Feb. 26, 1854, of consumption, PATTY CRANDALL, wife of Dea. Lot Crandall, in the 64th year of her age. She had been a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church for thirty-six years. She was one who desired to follow Christ, who said that he was meek and lowly in heart, and it is believed that she has found that rest unto her soul that Christ promised to those that come unto him.

In New Berlin, N. Y., April 8th, WILLIAM HENRY CLARKE, aged 38. Late in life was his learning of the truth as it is in Jesus, but rapid ere death his sweet attainance of that heavenly knowledge which passeth all understanding, and ripeneth and matureth only in the courts of the heavenly Jerusalem. He was a "member of Christ," not only in the outward union with the True Vine, but by the deep and constant participation of that spirit which such union is intended to convey; for he "drank of the rock that followed him, and that rock was Christ." He was a "child of God," not only in the pledge and covenant of a common fatherhood, but in that peculiar assimilation, by which the divine image and likeness of a holy, patient, gentle, loving temper was in him formed, according to His teaching who said, "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." He was "an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven;" a favored inheritor, not put off until late days—not deferred until after lengthy trial, but so early called, so soon bidden to the harvest rest, that, while we feel cast down and sad indeed at his loss, while we regret the little time that his beautiful, consistent profession of Jesus' name was given as an example, we yet are ready, according to the bidding of his Master and ours, to give thanks to our God for the good example of this His good and faithful servant, who now rests from his labors. R. W.

At Norfolk, Litchfield Co., Ct., on Saturday, Aug. 13, Mrs. ELIZA J., wife of Nathaniel P. Pettibone, aged 46 years. At the same place, on Thursday, Sept. 1, Mr. NATHANIEL P. PETTIBONE, late merchant of this city, in the 51st year of his age.

Regular Mail Line via Stonington for Boston,

PROVIDENCE, NEW BEDFORD, and TAUNTON. Inland Route, without change of cars or detention, carrying the Eastern Mail.

The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. John G. Bowne, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily (Sundays excepted) from Pier No. 2 N. R., first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or on the arrival of the mail train which leaves Boston at 5 30 P. M.

These steamers are unsurpassed for strength, safety, speed, comfort, and elegance. The officers are experienced and attentive.

The natural advantages of this route are superior to any other. Being shorter and more direct, the trip is more pleasantly and expeditiously performed, while passengers can always rely on reaching their destination in advance of those by either of the other routes.

The COMMODORE, from New York—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. From Stonington—Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday.

The C. VANDERBILT, from New York—Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. From Stonington—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

Eastern Association.

THE Eastern Association will hold its Eighteenth Anniversary with the Church in Greenmanville, Ct., commencing on the Fifth-day preceding the fourth Sabbath in May, (the 25th,) at 10 o'clock A. M. Introductory Sermon by Eld Joel Greene, of Rockville, R. I.; alternate, Walter B. Gillett, of Shiloh, N. J.

S. S. GRISWOLD, Secretary.

☞ The Executive Committee will hold its annual session at the same place on the morning of the Anniversary, at 9 o'clock A. M. By a vote of the Committee, at its semi-annual meeting, the churches of the Association were requested to forward to the Treasurer, A. M. Babcock, of Westerly, R. I., on or before the session of the Association, their respective contributions for defraying the expenses of missionary labor performed during the year now ending. S. S. G., Clerk.

Central Railroad Company of New Jersey.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Russian America.

In the war whose serious work is, after so much mere words and hesitating preparation, so close at hand, the Russian possessions on the north-eastern shores of the Pacific will very likely become a point of attack for the English cruisers. These possessions are administered by a Russo-American Company, chartered by the Imperial Government. This company is under the special direction of the Emperor, and has its principal seat at Sitka, one among the islands of the small Archipelago extending along the north-western coast of the American Continent. Having come into possession of private information concerning the present condition of this colony and of its trade, from a perfectly authentic source, we proceed to lay it before the public.

The native population in those regions is composed partly of Aleutians, Kuriles of Mongolian and Kamschatkian stock, but the principal bulk consists of the Kalashes, a tribe differing in type from the others. The Kalashes, are a fair and blue-eyed race, with oval features and light hair, and speak a language peculiar to themselves. The are easily managed with just treatment, but are brave and quickly roused to anger. For the most part they have preserved their independence, since out of nearly fifty thousand the greater part have not submitted to Russian domination. However, they all trade with the colony, bringing thither beaver-skins and potatoes. They are very fond of wheaten groats, and next to gun-powder, prefer that article in exchange for their produce. Like many other native American tribes, they are subdivided into smaller clans; living in continual feud with each other. They are all armed with rifles.

Sitka has a good harbor, but its entrance is most dangerous, or even impossible without experienced pilots, of whom there are only five or six in the settlement. The colony is commanded by a naval officer, and all the vessels in the service of the Russian Company are armed, and manned with sailors belonging to the imperial navy. For the defense of the roads, Sitka has no fortifications, but possesses some cannon and a few large mortars. Sitka is likewise the seat of an archbishop and of a theological seminary, as most of the natives that are subject to Russia have been converted to the Russo-Greek Church. The number of Russians in the colony is about 3,000. Of late an extensive trade has been carried on between the Russian Company and San Francisco. It consists in the export from Sitka of salt fish and of ice, the latter being its chief staple. From six to seven thousand tuns yearly are sent to San Francisco. A Company in that city, which, we believe, has at its head Mr. Beverly C. Saunders, formerly Collector of San Francisco, has established storehouses for ice at Sitka, and directs the work of cutting and storing, the laborers being furnished by the Russians. The latter are paid for the labor and the ice—which formerly brought them nothing—at the rate of $20 a tun; but the purchasers are no losers by the operation, since, if we are correctly informed, they realize not less than $120 a tun for their merchandise, delivered at San Francisco. The voyage thither occupies about fifteen days. It was with reference to an extension and prolonged possession of this advantageous branch of commerce, and to a scheme for the introduction of steamboats on the river Amour, that Mr. Saunders undertook his late journey to St. Petersburg. The War may, however, render valueless any contract which he may succeed in forming, for the British may either seize upon the island, which lies much nearer their continental possessions than those of the Russians, or may lay it under blockade.

Some time since the English Hudson's Bay Company leased from the Russians, for twenty years, the neighboring island of Stahina, and established a settlement upon it. This island grows the best of potatoes, and is cultivated by the Kalashes, who are said to be always on bad terms with the English, often attacking the settlement; and we are even told that they are able to prevent the English flag from floating over it. In case the war should be carried into these quarters, it is most probable, according to our informant, that the savages will fight on the side of the Russians. [N. Y. Tribune.

Culture of the Strawberry.

BY THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FARMER.

As no garden is complete in its appointments, without it has a bed or two of this delicious fruit—this luxurious and healthful source of enjoyment—we shall lay down a plan of culture, in the hope that it may call the attention of gentlemen, whose gardens are without them, to a necessity of planting one or more beds. A bed 30 feet square, would yield an ample supply for a family, both to be eaten with sugar and cream, and for preserves. Where the supply is desired to be prolonged, one bed should be selected with a southern exposure, the other with a northern one—these differences in exposure will continue the supply fully two weeks longer, a matter of great importance with a fruit at once so grateful to the palate, and so health-giving to the system, in its indulgence.

Selection of Bed.—For an early supply, select a bed with a southern exposure—for a late supply, select a northern exposure.

Soil.—The strawberry delights most in a moist soil—it is not material whether it be deep sandy loam, or a deep clay loam, so that it be moderately moist, but not wet. A clay loam, of proper texture, would probably produce most fruit; but not so early as a sandy loam. What we mean by proper texture of a clay loam, is one that is not very tenacious, but is friable, easily worked, and susceptible of being put in first-rate order.

Preparation of the Bed.—Let the bed be trenched to the depth of 12 inches at least. When thus dug, a dressing of a compost manure must be spaded in. As the spading progresses, let the soil be thoroughly pulverized with a rake. This done, put on a full dressing of compost formed of four parts well-rotted dung, three parts wood's-mould, or other rich mould, and one part slacked ashes, spade this in half spade deep, taking care to rake as the spading progresses, so as to bring the soil in fine tilth; and complete the work by passing the garden roller over the bed.

Laying off the Bed.—Your bed having been prepared as before directed, divide it into compartments or beds, four feet wide, with alleys two feet wide between each, for the convenience of working, weeding, and gathering the fruit.

Distance of Planting the Vines.—Make three rows of strawberries in each bed, and place vines 12 or 18 inches apart in the rows, according to the size of the variety.

Time of Setting out the Plants or Vines.—In Spring this can be done in March, in the Southern States; in April and May, in the Middle States, and in May in the North and East; in Summer, any time after the middle of August; in Autumn, during all September and October; if the fall be a very mild one, the planting may be continued till the middle of November. Beds set out in the fall or early in the spring, will bear crops the first year—those set out later, will bear the succeeding year.

Management of newly planted Beds.—After your vines are set out, place long straw or tanner's bark between the rows, to preserve moisture, and be careful to give the plants waterings every few days, until they take root, or a rain occurs. Beds planted in spring, must be watered in times of drouth, throughout the season, as the vines require moisture, and are injuriously affected by long-continued dry weather, unless thus assisted.

After Culture.—During the first two seasons, cut off the runners before they have a chance to take root. Early in each spring, remove the straw, or tanner's bark, from between the rows, work the ground between the vines with a small hoe, and draw a little earth around them; then spread fresh straw, or tanner's bark, or, indeed, both, between the rows, to preserve moisture in the earth, and protect the fruit, when formed, from grit and sand. This done, (before your vines get into bloom,) give them a thorough watering with a solution of soot, made in the proportion of six or eight quarts to a hogshead of water. This is the very best manuring you can give them, as the soot contains all the substances they need to aid them in the formation of their fruit, they are in the best possible condition to be taken up by the plants, through their feeders or spongioles.

While the fruit is being formed, the vines, in dry weather, must be repeatedly watered; but after they are in bloom, the utmost care must be observed not to wash off the farina of the flowers, as should you do so, you will inevitably prevent the formation of the fruit. To avoid this, the nozzle of the watering pot must be held down to the ground, and the water suffered to escape moderately therefrom, so as not to splash upon the flowers. Early, each spring, strew a a mixture of equal parts of plaster and salt over the bed, so as to whiten the soil.

After the vines have borne fruit the first year, say in the month of July, remove the straw, and weed the plants, remove all dead leaves, and give the vines a working with the hoe. This done, dig in with a fork a slight dressing of well-rotted manure or compost, a few inches in depth, say about four; rake the ground, and leave it thus, till, when long straw or tanner's bark or both, must be replaced between the rows. The treatment, each succeeding year, must be as before advised, with the exception that the runners must be permitted to grow the fourth year to supply the plants for setting out a new bed, as the power of yielding fruit, abundantly, only lasts four years. Indeed, they begin to decrease after the second year. Some permit the runners to root the third year, place manure on the old vines, dig them in, and rake, leaving the rooted runners to form the bed of strawberries the ensuing three years. If pains be taken to give proper direction to the runners, in rooting, this plan saves the labor of transplanting, and answers very well during one course. In manuring, ashes must not be forgotten in the compost, as the inorganic, as well as the organic matters carried off by the crops of fruit, must be restored to the soil.

New Inventions.

From the New York Tribune.

Wm. H. Johnson, of Granville, Mass., has invented a sewing machine in which a stitch of peculiar character is employed. The seam is made of a single thread with a needle, hook and lever. A loop of the thread is first run through the material to be sewed, a second loop is run through the material and the first loop is put through this; a third loop is run through the material and the first loop, the fourth loop is carried through the material and the third through it; thus putting the first through the second and around the third, the third through the fourth and around the fifth, and so forth, thus forming the belaying double loop stich.

Wm. Wickersham, of Boston, Mass., has invented another sewing machine, the peculiarity of which consists in forming two parallel rows of stitches at the same time, by the operation of two needles operated simultaneously by the same needle-moving machinery.

Samuel Loveland, of Astoria, N. Y., has invented a sectional dry-dock, in which is placed a tank or water-chamber transversely to each section of the dock, forming not only a central water ballast in the float directly under the keel of the vessel to be raised, but when empty a dry tank for the purpose of giving access to the keel in making repairs. These water-chambers are combined with buoyant chambers or floats attached to the ends of the tank.

J. L. L. Morris, of Reading, Pa., has invented an improved steam-hammer, the novelty of which consists in admitting steam to the cylinder above the piston, and exhausting the steam therefrom through parts which are opened and closed by an annular valve working in the cylinder itself, or in a steam chest which is placed above, and forms a continuation of the cylinder. A bell crank latch-lever is also combined with a trigger or catch in such a manner that when the fulcrum of the said latch-lever is attached and stationary in relation to the hammer-block, and one end or arm is attached to the connecting-rod of the hammer-block and receives the necessary movement to actuate the trigger or catch, to set free the valve-rod, by means of a continuous descent of the connecting-rod after the hammer is arrested by striking the blow. The hammer-block, instead of being connected rigidly to the beam as in the ordinary helve-hammer, is suspended from it, and works between slides. By this arrangement the hammer is constrained to strike with its face parallel to the anvil; whatever may be the thickness of the metal, the shock caused by the percussion of the hammer is also prevented from being communicated to the remainder of the machinery.

P. L. Weimer is also the inventor of a steam-hammer, the novelty of which consists in a peculiar arrangement of devices, by the operation of which the valve for admitting the steam into the cylinder is opened by the shock caused by the concussion of the hammer, or more immediately by the recoil of the anvil in consequence of the blow. The admission of steam into the cylinder by the recoil is not new, but only the peculiar arrangement by which this is accomplished.

Lewis Fagin, of Cincinnati, O., has invented an improved smut machine, which consists in the arrangement of a blowing apparatus in such a manner that the upper or suction fan will take the air at the center and discharge it at the periphery, and in combination with a scouring mill, consisting of cones arranged in circular horizontal grooves, having perforated terraces, which thoroughly scours the grain after it has been separated from the chaff and lighter particles by the fan. The grain is fed to the mill by a cylindrical hopper and feed pipe.

Jonathan Burrage, of Roxbury, Mass., has invented an improved process for making varnishes. The virgin turpentine, or that which is in the natural liquid state in which it exudes from the tree, is commonly employed by varnish-makers. Mr. Burrage, however, employs the gum which has been dried, and thus, in a measure, decolorized and purified by the evaporation of its essential oil. Gum Thust and Gum Lass, as they are termed, (Canada balsam and Venice turpentine in their dried state,) are employed by him in combination with the essential oil of turpentine.

Andrew Overend, of Philadelphia, Penn., has obtained a patent on a machine for wetting paper for the press. This invention consists of a self-acting feed-board, combined with felted rollers which are saturated during the intervals between the passage of the paper, and convey the water to the upper wetting cylinder. There are two of these, which are connected with a fly.

James Berry, of Roxbury, Mass., has recently obtained a patent for the formation of the molds in which to cast the blocks of calico printers, in sections or prisms, by the combination of which a great variety of patterns can be produced at a trifling expense. It is proposed to extend this invention to the production of cylinders as well as blocks, and also to set the types for the molds by machinery, from which a great saving of labor will result.

G. B. Field, of St. Louis, Mo., has constructed a rotary cultivator or plow, which is formed in a cylindrical shape, with cutting plates or spades, between which are interposed clearing boards for removing the earth adhering to the plates. Behind this cylinder is arranged a rotary harrow, sustained above the ground and in the rear of the cultivating cylinder, for the purpose of breaking and pulverizing the earth after it has been loosened by the plow.

A. H. Caryl, of Sandusky City, has invented a machine to dress the tangled flax after having been passed through a threshing machine for the seed. There are immense quantities of such flax wasted every year in Ohio. The machine in operation costs $280, and will clean 100 pounds per hour from well rotted broken straw; and he is building one to cost about $400 that will break and clean a tun a day. The clean fiber of this tangled flax is in the form of a tow, but clean enough for spinning, and will be very valuable for the paper-maker.

Working under Water.

The steamer Ericsson which was sunk in New York harbor during the recent gale, will be raised. A daily paper in speaking of it says:—

The curious operation of men working in submarine armor may be seen at the Ericsson. Above water they are, when thus clad, the most helpless of mortals. They are clothed in a thick and heavy India rubber dress, with belts about their legs and body filled with shot to the weight of about 128 pounds. The head is incased in a huge copper cap, resting on their shoulders, with glass before the eyes and mouth. An India rubber tube of about an inch diameter, is connected to the top of the copper cap. The other end of the tube is attached to an air-pump. When the mouth-piece of the cap is closed, which of course is done preparatory to the descent, the air-pump is vigorously worked. The air thus forced in at the head finds its way out through the dress where it terminates on the arms, and sometimes by a tube from the breast, guarded against the introduction of water. When the diver is thus equipped for his submarine excursion, he lies helpless on the deck. A rope is attached to his body, which is passed through a block on the yard-arm, and he is hoisted like a motionless piece of baggage over the side, and lowered into the water. He soon descends to where he does not materially feel the weights attached to him, and begins to help himself and control his own movements. His motion and position under water are clearly disclosed by the violent agitation directly over his head, occasioned by the escape of the air pumped through the tube which leads to his miniature prison. A single line is taken in the hand of the diver, by which he signalizes those above water. One pull is the signal to be taken up, two pulls for less air, and three pulls for more air. The work which the diver can perform is quite limited, but it is done with considerable celerity.

New Process of Making Bread.

A very remarkable exhibition took place recently at the Marylebone Workhouse, London, by Messrs. Morlan, Martin Journet, a French firm, who undertook to demonstrate before a Committee of the Board of Guardians that, by a peculiar modification in the fermenting process, the amount of bread from a given weight of flour could be increased to at least 50 per cent. This singular method was invented by a French gentleman, a pupil of Orfila. Two sacks of flour were made use of, both under seal, and issued by the authorities of the workhouse. One of these was manipulated in the ordinary way, the other by the associated French manufacturers. The results were in the highest degree satisfactory. The first sack converted into bread by the usual method produced 90 loaves, weighing 360 lbs. The second bag of flour, placed in the hands of the French bakers, produced 154 loaves, weighing 520 lbs., giving an increase of nearly 50 per cent., under circumstances very disadvantageous to the owners of the secret. The place, the oven and apparatus were all new and strange to their workmen, who had many difficulties to contend with. It was admitted by the spectators that in consequence of such drawbacks, there was a considerable waste of bread in the oven. There was a large attendance of scientific men, as well as bakers from the country and city, who witnessed the process with the keenest interest. All frankly and readily admitted that everything was above board and fairly conducted, and that the result had exceeded their expectations. This marvelous increase in production does not arise from any weighty substance mixed with the dough, as no extraneous ingredient can be discovered in the loaf by the most rigid chemical analysis. The agency or properties employed must therefore be of a volatile nature, evaporating during the firing process. It is considered that the augmented produce must result from a power of the secret ingredients in checking the ordinary amount of loss of material in bread-making, escaping in gases on the application of heat. M. Martin, who was present during the whole day, stated that the newly discovered mixture had a strong tendency to develop the glutinous substance in the flour, and that the nutritious element was by no means affected, much less sacrificed for quantity. The manager and other principal officers of the workhouse expressed themselves highly pleased with the exhibition, and viewed the new process as a great boon to the community at large, especially in these times of high prices. The saving to England annually by the working of this new plan would be no less than ten millions sterling.

Gardens—Garden Seeds—Ashes.

No one who has witnessed the good results of the application of wood ashes to light lands, whether applied as a top-dressing to grass-fields, or sown broadcast and turned under as food for corn, potatoes, or other crops, will be willing to dispose of them to ash-pedlars for the trifling consideration of ten cents per bushel. I am decidedly of opinion, that farmers can better afford to buy than to sell ashes, even if they have to pay one shilling a bushel for them. We all know that heavy, clayey soils are injured rather than benefitted by ashes, they having a tendency to render them more solid or compact; and as such lands usually possess sufficient quantities of alkaline substances to supply with this necessary ingredient any plant that we may wish to grow on them, it would be useless, for this reason alone, to use them on these. On all light lands I have found ashes to be a most excellent dressing. Corn contains large quantities of potash, consequently ashes may with profit be liberally used on corn-ground; as indeed they may on all light lands, on which we may wish to grow such plants as contain this ingredient, (potash) and there are but few without it. Ashes are very good to strew broadcast over orchard grounds; they not only prevent worms, ants, and other marauders from taking up their abodes in these grounds to the injury of both trees and fruit, but they have a decidedly beneficial effect in causing the trees, if they are rough and knarly, to assume a green and healthful appearance, and the fruit to grow large and fair.

The garden is the place where ashes cannot well be dispensed with; almost all kinds of vegetables are benefitted by them, and as in the orchard they destroy thousands of insect depradators, so they will have the same effect in protecting the garden plants from their enemies. Every farmer should have a garden wherein he can raise an abundant supply of garden vegetables. There is no food on earth so healthful as is vegetable food, and there is no place on a farm where a farmer can spend a portion of his time more pleasantly or profitably, than in his garden.

Every one should raise his own garden-seeds; by so doing, one runs no risk of loosing his labor by planting old or unripe seed. At the proper time, last season, we went to work and prepared our ground for a garden. We labored hard, spading up the ground, and as we frequently do, laying it off in beds ready for the reception of the seed, but the labor we counted nothing, for it was expected that in due time we should reap, yet in this we were disappointed; we bought poor seed, and it never came up! Our expectations failed, and our labor was lost. Now, if you do not raise your own seed, be sure and buy that which is good, and success will be almost sure to attend you. [Boston Cultivator.

Renovating old Grape Vines.

The best mode of renovating an old grape vine, is to make bare its roots for several feet around the stem—remove the ground entirely, and then apply two or three bushels of bones, which should always be preserved about a place for this purpose partially broken up; and on the top of these add from one to two bushels of wood ashes, according to the size of the hole to be filled, mixed with some hog manure and rich soil. In one year, should this plan be pursued, a marked change for the better would be produced.

In pruning an old grape vine which has been allowed for years to take its own course, it should not be topped too short the first year. About 12 or 15 feet, according to size, should be left to remain; the lateral branches should be thinned out to one or two feet apart, and at that distance tied to the trellis firmly. The fruit-bearing twigs found upon these, should be pruned down so as to allow about three buds to each. And the work is done.

The best time to prune is at any period before the sap begins to circulate—say in January, February and first half of March.

No external application to the branches will help their productiveness. Soap-suds applied to the roots plentifully, on washing-days, are of great advantage. [Telegraph.

Wash your Fruit Trees.

During some of the warm and leisure days of spring, before the buds of your fruit trees swell much, and the leaves begin to start, it would be well to wash your fruit trees from top to bottom. If you cannot find any thing more convenient, a weak lye made of wood ashes will be good. There will be so much danger of injuring the trees before the buds start by this preparation. A lye made by a pound of potash to two gallons of water makes a good wash. There are, however, two better preparations than those above mentioned. The first is a solution of carbonate of soda, commonly called sal soda, and the second is a suds made of whale oil soap. We have used the soda and like it better than the lye of ashes or potash. It is now used a good deal in what are called washing fluids, and the dealers can afford to let you have it cheaper than potash.

Put a pound into two gallons of water, and apply it with a swab. We never see any damage done by it. It will keep the bark green, and it kills the moss, which instantly changes color on touching it, and in time scales off. The whale soap can be bought in casks in Boston at the seed stores. It is an excellent preparation for this purpose—cleansing and invigorating the bark and destroying mosses, and such like nuisances, and also insects.

Sometimes apple trees, especially young trees, become plastered over with a species of scales, looking like a minute muscle shell, which sticks very closely to the bark. They are the covering to an egg of a minute fly, that lays them there, and they are injurious to the growth of the tree. Soft soap smeared over them will destroy them. Dr. Norris recommeds two parts of soap, eight parts of water, and lime enough to make a whitewash, which he would apply with a brush. This may be applied any time. [Exchange paper.

REMARKABLE MAN.—At a temperance meeting held in Alabama, about six years ago, Col. Lemanousky, who had been 23 years in the armies of Napoleon Bonaparte, addressed the meeting. He arose before the audience, tall, erect and vigorous, with a glow of health upon his cheek, and said:

"You see before you a man 70 years old. I have fought two hundred battles, have fourteen wounds on my body, have lived thirty days on horse flesh, with the bark of trees for my bread, snow and ice for my drink, the canopy of heaven for covering, without stockings or shoes on my feet, and only a few rags of clothing. In the deserts of Egypt I have marched for days with a burning sun upon my naked head; feet blistered in the scorching sand, and with eyes, nostrils and mouth filled with dust—and with a thirst so tormenting that I have opened the veins of my arms and sucked my own blood! Do you ask me how I survived all these horrors? I answer, that under the providence of God, I owe my preservation, my health and vigor, to this fact, that I never drank a drop of spiritous liquor in my life! and, (continued he,) Baron Larry, chief of the medical staff of the French Army, has stated as a fact, that the 6,000 survivors, who had safely returned from Egypt, were all of them men who abstained from ardent spirits.

THE LORD'S BUSINESS.—Our friend, the Colonel Harper who did the city good service as Mayor, (but whose porringers around the Park fountain did not prove a profitable investment,) is a good deal of a wag, and loves a joke as well as his dinner. We happened to be sitting in the counting-room of the "Brothers" one day, when there entered a sleek looking gentleman, with a straight collared cutaway coat, and a broad brimmed drab hat. He advanced towards the Colonel. "Is Harper in?" "I am one of them," said the ex-mayor. "Well, sir, my name is Uriah G. Hopkins. I belong to the Oneida Conference. I come here on the Lord's business." "The man who attends to the Lord's business," said the Colonel, without moving a muscle, "is out at present; he will be in at two o'clock."

This was a simple fact; all donations to charitable and religious societies being designated to one particular partner of the house. [Knickerbocker Magazine.

Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society.

Constitution.

ART. I. This Society shall be known by the name of "The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society."

ART. II. The object of this Society shall be, to print and publish such periodicals, books, &c., as shall meet the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, and promote the cause of Christ generally.

ART. III. Each contributor of five dollars may become a Member of the Society, and each contributor of twenty-five dollars may become an Honorary Director, with the privilege of participating in the deliberations of the Board of Managers, but not of voting.

ART. IV. The Society shall meet annually, to celebrate its Anniversary, to hear the Reports of its Board and Treasurer, to elect its officers and managers for the ensuing year, and transact any other business that may come before it, connected with its legitimate object.

ART. V. A special meeting of the Society may be called at any time by the President, at the request of the Board, provided that a notice of the same shall be published in the Society's paper at least four weeks previous to the meeting.

ART. VI. The officers of the Society shall be a President, two or more Vice Presidents, a Corresponding Secretary, a Recording Secretary, a Treasurer, and two Auditors, who, together with four others elected for the purpose, shall constitute a Board of Managers to conduct the business of the Society, having power to make their own by-laws.

ART. VII. The officers and managers shall be chosen at the annual meeting of the Society, by a majority of members present, and shall continue to discharge the duties assigned to them respectively, until superseded by a new election. But the Board shall have power to fill all vacancies occasioned by the death or resignation of officers or managers when the Society is not in session.

ART. VIII. It shall be the daty of the President to preside in all the meetings of the Society and of the Board, and to perform such other duties as devolve upon him by the provisions of this Constitution. In case of the President's inability, or at his request, one of the Vice Presidents shall perform the duties of his office.

ART. IX. The Corresponding Secretary shall report the correspondence of the Society quarterly to the Board—keep files of all letters received, and copies of all letters sent by him—and prepare the Annual Report of the Board.

ART. X. The Recording Secretary shall keep the Minutes of the Society and the Board—notify the regular and special meetings of the Board, by advertisement in the Society's paper, or by letter to each member, as may be required—and submit the records to the Corresponding Secretary for the purpose of preparing the Annual Report.

ART. XI The Treasurer shall keep all funds of the Society, and pay all bills duly approved by the General Agent—report all receipts and expenditures of the Society quarterly at the meetings of the Board—acknowledge the receipts weekly in the columns of the paper published by the Society—submit his books to the Auditors, when required, for examination—and whenever a successor shall be appointed, make over to the Society all funds remaining in his hands, together with the books and vouchers.

ART. XII. It shall be the duty of the Auditors to examine the Treasurer's account at the close of each financial year, and in case he finds it correct, to certify the same to the Society in connection with the Treasurer's Annual Report. He shall also examine and certify the same, at any other time, at the request of the Board.

ART. XIII. The Board of Managers shall meet quarterly for the transaction of business, at such time and place as shall have been appointed at a previous meeting. The Recording Secretary shall call extra meetings of the Board whenever any three members of the Board shall request him to do so. The minutes of each meeting of the Board shall be signed by the Chairman and the Recording Secretary.

ART. XIV. Should there at any time, on the presentation of the Annual Report of the Board of Managers, be a surplus on hand, over and above what may, in the judgment of the Board, be required to meet the wants of the establishment, the Society shall divide such surplus in equal sums among the following benevolent objects, viz.: Missions, the circulation of religious Tracts, the education of candidates for the Ministry, and the support of indigent superannuated ministers or their widows and orphans. Should the Society for any reason ever be dissolved, its property, if any, shall be divided in the same manner as above provided in case of surplus.

ART. XV. This Constitution may be altered at any Annual Meeting of the Society, by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

American Sabbath Tract Society's Publications.

THE American Sabbath Tract Society publishe the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:—

- No. 1—Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
- No. 2—Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES—NO. 3.

"He shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant"—("fall away" from, 2 Thess. 2: 3.) Not Pagans, but those who had embraced the truth, and professed to be guided by it, forsook the Bible, and turned to the decisions of Popes, Councils, and Bishops, as infallible guides in all matters of faith and practice; the common people were also forbidden either to possess or read the Bible. The barbarians who conquered Rome became bitter enemies of the Catholic Church, and waged several severe persecutions against it; but the Roman Emperors took part with (had intelligence with) the Catholic church, and the Vandal and Ostrogothic wars (533 to 538) were commenced and carried on to put down heresies, (every religion and belief contrary to Catholicism,) and to exalt the supremacy of the Roman Catholic church. These wars resulted in the overthrow of the "three horns," Goths, Vandals and Burgundians, and the rise and establishment of the little horn, "before whom three fell," Dan. 7: 20; also 5: 8—"I considered the horns (ten,) and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots." And v. 24—"And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings (kingdoms,) that shall arise; and another shall rise after them (or among them,) and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings" (kingdoms.) Thus arose the Papacy, to which "the dragon gave his power, and his seat (Rome,) and great authority." Rev. 13: 2. This was fully accomplished A. D. 538, when the churches of Eastern and Western Rome, together with the states or kingdoms, united and harmonized.

"And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily (abomination,) and they shall place (establish) the abomination that maketh desolate." Rome, i. e. the Roman empire—the strong place, or "sanctuary of strength," became divided into ten kingdoms in 483, at which time they had abandoned, "taken away, the daily" or continual abomination of Pagan worship, and by 538 they all with one mind gave their power (Rev. 17: 13) to establish and support the papacy, "the abomination that maketh desolate." In 508, the Goths under Alaric commenced a war for the Papacy, which was already in arms, in which they were soon joined by the Huns and Bulgarians; the Emperor Justinian also took part in the same, and the result was the extermination of 65,000 heretics, (so called by the Roman church.) Thus was placed "the abomination that maketh desolate," in and over the church, "holy place," "temple of God." See Gibbon's Rome. It took about 30 years to bring about this state of things, which produced the Justinian code of laws, that continued in force in the papal church until 1798—1260 years.

"And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries; but the people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits. And they that understand among the people shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity and by spoil, many days. Now, when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help; but many shall cleave to them with flatteries. And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end, because it is yet for a time appointed." It is very evident, that these four verses, (32d to 35th,) together with some that follow, refer to the appointed time of 1260 years—"many days." It is equally evident, that this period reaches to what the angel of God calls "the time of the end." During the 1260 years, the saints were given into the hand of Papacy, which had power over their lives and actions. This power ceased in 1798, when Bonaparte took the Pope a prisoner of war. Such as do wickedly against the covenant (the Bible) forbade the possession or reading of the sacred volume, and probably more than 50,000,000 were persecuted and slain because of their faith in God's word. They regarded not them who could "only kill the body;" the instruction which they received made them bold, and they met death with a martyr's hope. They were slain "by the sword" in wars; "by flame" at the stake; "by captivity" in dungeons and inquisitions, where many died, and from whence few ever escaped; "by spoil" in the confiscation of property, &c. The most tempting promises, and the most artful flatteries, beset the faithful, to turn them from the truth, and in some few instances men of learning and ability were thus ensnared. Thus things would continue (so the angel declares) "to the time of the end." The Justinian code, under which these persecutions were carried on, continued to exist until 1798, since which it has not been in force. This, I think, marks definitely what the angel calls "the time of the end."

"And the king shall do according to his will, and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every God, and shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods." "Reigneth over the kings of the earth." Rev. 17: 18, and 13: 5, 7—"And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things, and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty-two months, (1260 years.) And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them; and power was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations." 2 Thess. 2: 4—"Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; (claims to forgive sins after a person is dead, and transfer thereby the soul from hell to heaven;) so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God (or the church,) showing himself that he is God." The Popes required that they should be addressed as "Most Holy Lord God the Pope." Infallibility is also claimed by this power; saints are its chosen mediators; the mother of Jesus Christ our Saviour, is addressed in adorations and prayers, and saints are canonized as superior to angels. It would take a volume to enumerate and define all the blasphemies of this power, about which we cannot disagree, as all Protestant commentators apply it to the papacy, and there is not, neither has been, any other power to which this prophecy can apply. Yet some writers have attempted to apply it to Antiochus, B. C. 164 to 170, and some others to atheistical France, A. D. 1789 to 1798, contrary to both history and the word of God.

"And shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for that that is determined shall be done." If we inquire what indignation is here referred to, see Dan. 9: 27—"For the overspreading of abominations, he shall make desolate, even until the consummation." The angel tells Daniel, "Behold I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation." Verse 13—"To give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot." How long? "Unto 2300 days" (years.) Luke 21: 24—"Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." When will the indignation end? When the 2300 years end; when "the beast is slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame," Dan. 7: 11; when "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High," (v. 27.) Daniel saw that it lasted "until the Ancient of Days came, and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." v. 22.

"Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god; for he shall magnify himself above all." The Pope, and consequently the whole papal hierarchy, forsook the oracles of God, and pursued their own idolatrous inclinations; and the Pope, claiming to be God's vicegerent on earth, assumed the title of God, and could not consistently acknowledge any God. Thus he magnified "himself above all."

"But in his estate shall he honor the god of forces; and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honor with gold and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things." By force (not by persuasion) he shall cause men to yield to his power. The Eucharist, or Sacrament, was declared to be the very body and blood of Jesus Christ, "God blessed forever." See Catholic Catechism. "Q. What is the Holy Eucharist? A. It is a sacrament which contains the body and blood, the soul and DIVINITY of Jesus Christ, under the forms and appearances of bread and wine. Q. Is it not bread and wine which is first put upon the altar at the celebration of mass? A. Yes; it is always bread and wine, TILL the priest pronounces the words of consecration during the mass. Q. What happens BY THESE WORDS? A. The bread is CHANGED into the BODY of Jesus Christ, and the wine into his BLOOD. Q. What is this change called? A. It is called TRANSUBSTANTIATION, that is to say, a change of one substance to another. Q. Does anything remain of the bread and wine after consecration? A. Nothing remains of them but the forms or appearances. Q. What do you mean by forms or apppearances? A. I mean that which appears to our senses; as the figure, the color, the taste. Q. Is there anything under the form of bread but the body of Jesus Christ? A. There is also there his blood, his soul, his DIVINITY; in short, the whole PERSON of Jesus Christ." This strange god the Romish church worship wherever it bears rule (in its strong holds,) and even in this country.

"Thus shall he do in the most strong holds, with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory; and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain." Almost all the nations of the earth have been divided off, and meted out to bishops, priests, &c., who have been required to exact a revenue wherever it was possible, and so it continues even to the present day.

SPECIAL PROVIDENCES.

Let us look at the career of Luther. Among the many incidents in his eventful life which illustrate a special Providence, we will only advert to that decisive one which led him to abandon a secular life and enter a monastery. He is returning from Mansfield; the death of Alexis has greatly affected him, and made him feel the vanity of life and the nearness of death, more than he has ever done before. Erfurth is near, where he will again have to plunge into studies and pursuits for which these thoughts have given him a distaste. A thunderbolt bursts from the sky, flashes by him, and buries itself in the earth at his feet. His decision is at once taken. He asks himself what his condition would have been if that bolt had struck him. He shudders at the thought, and thenceforward determines to devote himself to a life of religon and to a preparation for eternity. How different would the history of the world have been had the life of Luther ended there, or if it had not been turned into a new channel! Had his course been different, ours must have been so too. Yet on how many contingencies and chances did it seem to depend! That he should have got just to that spot, and no farther; that the bolt should have fallen just where and when it did, and not strike him; that it should have descended just at the moment when his mind was opened to receive such lessons and influences—all these things suppose an overruling Providence, controlling his footsteps, acquainted with his thoughts, launching the thunderbolt, and directing its flight; thus preparing for the Reformation, and shielding the head of the great, but as yet unconscious reformer, from harm.

LIFE, DEATH, IMMORTALITY.

To tread with firm, unwavering step,
The strait and narrow way;
To ever humbly trust in God;
To hope, and watch, and pray;
To wipe from sorrow's pallid cheek
The bitter, scalding tear;
To give the child of want and woe,
True friendship and sincere;
To nerve the heart with heavenly strength,
For this world's earnest strife;
To bravely battle for the right—
This, this is the true life.

And when the silver cord is loosed,
And earthly ties are riven,
To calmly turn from this fair earth,
And fix the thoughts on heaven;
To lean upon the Saviour's arm,
Through the dark valley's gloom,
And walk with firm and fearless tread,
The passage to the tomb;
To lay the frail, weak body down,
And yield the fleeting breath,
In deep, strong faith, and holy love—
This is triumphant death.

And then, to soar on angel wings
To that fair world of joy,
Where God, the Lord, forever reigns,
And bliss knows no alloy;
To bow, while circling ages roll,
Before the "great white throne,"
And join the swelling song of praise
To the Eternal One;
To dwell in innocence and love,
From sin and sorrow free;
To know no grief, no tears, no death—
Would be a heaven to me.
But ear cannot hear, or heart conceive,
Nor can our vision see,
The glories, the supreme delights,
Of immortality.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

Circular Letter of the Harmony Baptist Association.

Concluded from last week.

5th. The religion which is inculcated by secret societies, is infidelity in its most dangerous and delusive form. It professes to save men, and yet it has no Saviour. It rejects the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom alone is salvation. He is allowed no place in that system, is not once named as the Saviour of sinners. Members of those societies are taught to rely for salvation on the observance of moral duties. If they practice the principles taught by those societies, they are assured in the strongest terms, that they will be welcomed to a seat in the grand lodge above.

Take the society of Odd Fellows, that professes to be not only the handmaid of the christian religion, and equal to it, but even above it; to accomplish that for our fellow men which christianity never has and never can accomplish. It would be an easy task to fill quite a volume of quotations from the standard authorities of Odd Fellowship, proving the truth of this position. But as we are writing a Circular Letter for an Association, we are of necessity limited, and our quotations must be few and brief. Those which we here offer will be found directly to the point. Odd Fellowship professes to conduct men to heaven. The Bible does not more fully assure the humble believer in Christ of an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom, than Odd Fellowship does those who practice its moral duties, an entrance into heaven, under the figure of the "grand lodge above."

In the Revelation of Odd Fellowship, by Dr. Willis, it is said concerning the man who shall observe and practice its moral precepts, "It will give his conscience the serenity resulting from moral conduct, and point him to the beams of hope and happiness in another and better world."

In the "Covenant and Official Magazine," a standard publication of Odd Fellowship, we find the following language: "The injunction of the Saviour of mankind to his disciples, 'If ye love me keep my commandments,' is not a more perfect test of christianity than that which the spirit of Odd Fellowship this day delivers unto you: If ye love and cherish this institution, keep its precepts and practice its virtues to all mankind. So shall you not only be loved and honored of men, but when this earthly Lodge is closed, your entrance into the Grand Lodge above shall be greeted by the Eternal Sire, in the rich words of his promise, For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat," &c. This sublime yet bombastic language is to be found in an address delivered in Cincinnati, April 26, 1842, by John Brough, District Deputy Grand Master. It is published in their "Official Magazine," and of course has the sanction of the Order. According to this, to love and cherish the institution of Odd Fellowship, to keep its precepts and practice its virtues, is as perfect a test of Christianity—that is, as perfect a test of being a Christian—as it is to love Christ and keep his commands. Then all such are assured, that when this earthly lodge shall close, they will be greeted by the Eternal Sire to the Grand Lodge above!

This is not a solitary instance in which such language is found in the standard works of the Order. The following is from another address published in the same Official Magazine. Rev. C. B. Parsons, addressing members of the Order, says; "So when life shall wane apace, and the spirit shall begin to plume its wings for another and better world, the Almighty Grand Master of the celestial lodge above may give the traveling word, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of thy Lord."

Take another: "And when laid away in the silent tomb, your spirits rest in the bosom of your Father God, and have seats in the celestial lodge above." These quotations cannot fail to prove conclusively, to all candid persons, that Odd Fellowship, as a religious institution, professes to be equal to Christianity—to save men from their sins and conduct them safely to heaven.

But this is not the worst feature of the system: it claims to be above the christian religion—that is, as a society, it does for mankind what the church of Christ cannot do. The following quotation is from the Constitution and By-Laws of Kiantone Lodge, No. 393: "One conviction fills our hearts; one purpose nerves our arms. Man is suffering. Man is ruined. We can better his condition; we can elevate his character; we can inspire him with noble aspirations, and direct him to the better life to come. To accomplish these objects, our order was founded." This then was the object for which the order was founded—to direct man to the better life to come; yet it has no Saviour through whom to direct man to that better life. Christ, as the chief corner stone, is set at nought, just as he was by the old infidel Jews, and man is directed to the better life to come, by observing the moral precepts of Odd Fellowship. This writer continues: "Man needed something more done for him. Priesthood had invented a thousand religions, with majestic emblems and solemn rituals; philosophy had thought, and learning had studied for ages. Heroes had won crowns of victory. Empires, Republics, arts and religions, had risen and gone to decay—but man was the same suffering, unhelped being still. Could nothing be done to illumine and elevate so noble a creature, susceptible of such exalted sentiments, struggling and longing for hope, progress and immortality? Yes, the deliverer comes; he comes clad in the regalia and bearing the ensignia of Odd Fellowship. Odd Fellowship heard the signal and sent back the response." Here Odd Fellowship is exalted infinitely above Christianity. All religions (the Christian as well as all others) had failed to meet the exigencies of man's desperate case. He is still uncared for and unhelped. But lo! a deliverer comes! comes clad in the regalia and bearing the ensignia of Odd Fellowship! comes to do for poor, suffering, helpless man, what the glorious gospel of the Son of God had failed to do! Are not these pretensions blasphemous?

The following quotation, which is of the same profane character, is from "The Symbal," an Odd Fellowship journal: "Odd Fellowship claims only to be an humble handmaid of religion—an institution to aid in carrying out some of the great aims of religion in a degree which has not been attained by the Christian church, and answer some great purpose in the practical application of Christian principles, which the church as an organization cannot attain, in the present condition of the world, however much she may desire to attain them." Here Odd Fellowship is represented as carrying out some of the great aims of religion in a degree which has not been attained by the Christian church; and as making a practical application of Christian principles which the church as an organization cannot make. Who does not see, that in such pretensions the church of our Lord Jesus Christ is treated with contempt, and Odd Fellowship is exalted infinitely above it. It can do what the church cannot do; it can carry out the great design of religion and make an application of Christian principles which the church cannot. Such are the views and feelings of many who belong to the order. The writer once interrogated a brother in the church, who had recently joined the lodge, Do you find anything there better than you find in the church? He promptly replied—I do. Now such a system we unhesitatingly pronounce to be infidelity in its most dangerous and delusive form. It rejects, with the utmost scorn, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Saviour of sinners. It rejects the Bible as a special revelation from God, given by the inspiration of his Spirit. True, it receives the Bible, makes use of it, and professes to believe it, just as infidels have done in all ages. It receives, admits, and commends, and enjoins the moral precepts of the book. The greatest infidels, the most violent opposers of the Bible, have acknowledged that it teaches the purest system of morals in the world. This Odd Fellowship does, and it does nothing more. The soul and marrow of that system of revelation—the doctrine of the Trinity, the godhead of Christ, and the Holy Spirit, the apostacy of man, his total moral depravity, his redemption by the blood of the cross, regeneration by the Spirit of God—all these cardinal truths of Christianity, Odd Fellowship rejects as sectarian fables. The Bible is placed on a level with the Koran of the Mussulman, the Shaster of the Hindoos, and all other religious books under heaven which teach good moral precepts. In their view, it is no more inspired of God than those are. We hence find the following language in "The Independent Odd Fellow's Journal:" "Odd Fellowship is but an abstract of Christianity, embracing and enjoining all its moral precepts, and leaving the church in full possession of everything that is of a sectarian, theoretical, or doctrinal character." Take from the Bible those things which are here denominated sectarian, theoretical, and doctrinal, and what is left? A system of pure morals, just what infidelity has always admitted.

Odd Fellowship is therefore designed to bring together men of all religions under heaven who acknowledge the being of a God. No matter who they are, nor what their religion is, if they believe in the existence of a Being who created and preserves the world. They may be Jews, Mohamedans, Christians, Infidels, or Pagans—all are admitted as a band of brethren. On this point I will present a quotation from an address delivered in Rochester, N. Y., June 2, 1842, by J. W. Dwinnell. After speaking of those who believe that the Bible contains the revealed will of God, he says: "There are others who, believing that God has not in any age of the world left men without some witness of his truth, but has from time to time progressively revealed himself to man; and regarding whatever is true as a revelation from the source of all wisdom, without conceding that the Scriptures contain a special and exclusive revelation, still recognize them as containing a system of morality and benevolence which is true, and therefore of an obligation upon man, which cannot be violated without consequences of evil. Contenting itself with this recognition, our institution goes no further in erecting a standard of religious faith." Mark this—our institution goes no further. That is, it does not concede that the Scriptures contain a special revelation from God, but it recognizes them as containing a system of morality and benevolence which is true; just as all natural religionists throughout the world will do. Here they all harmonize in this system of morality, while they hold that the Bible is no more inspired than any other book. And everything that distinguishes the Christian religion as a system of salvation, and different from all other religions on earth, is rejected. Hence the orator continues: "It enjoins no sectarian mode of belief, nor does it even permit such topics to be discussed within the walls of a lodge; and by adopting so simple and comprehensive a rule on the subject, the order is able to embrace among its members worthy men of almost infinite varieties of religious belief, as well as to avoid the imputation of adopting an unsound and illiberal principle of exclusiveness." By rejecting everything contained in the Bible save its code of morals, the Order is able, it is true, to embrace among its members men of almost infinite varieties of religious belief, even the bitterest enemies of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the most violent opposers of his gospel. Then, having divorced the great cardinal doctrines of the Bible from its code of morals, it has the impudence to profess to be founded on the Bible, and holds forth, in unmistakable language, that all who shall carefully observe and practice these moral precepts will be welcomed to a seat in the grand lodge above.

Therefore, the only religious qualification required of any person, in order for membership, is "to believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, the Creator and Preserver of the Universe." This is all the religious test Odd Fellowship presents; and those members who possess this and live according to that system of morals, though they may be the avowed enemies of Jesus Christ, and of all the peculiarities of the Christian faith, are taught to believe that all will be well with them in the future; they are pointed to beams of hope in a better world.

Is not this infidelity in its most dangerous and delusive form? The mediation of Jesus Christ, as revealed to us in the holy scriptures, is openly and unblushingly rejected; and men are taught to climb to heaven some other way, depending on the practice of moral duties. The intention of this system is to find out, if it were possible, some other way to heaven than by and through the cross of Christ. It has no repentance and confession of sin—no sacrifices of a broken heart and a contrite spirit—no self-denial—no bearing the cross—nothing but the practice of moral duties—yet eternal life is the promised reward. This we consider to be one of the greatest evils of Odd Fellowship, or of any other secret society. Hundreds and thousands are no doubt deceived; they are led to reject, with infidel scorn, the atonement of Christ, and to rely wholly upon the religion of nature, or their own good performances, for salvation.

Now, every church member who joins that order gives his sanction to this system of infidelity, and by the whole weight of his influence, sustains it. This is a sufficient reason why he should be considered a subject of gospel discipline, and be dealt with accordingly.

6th. No man can discharge the duties of a Christian, and at the same time live up to the obligations of a member of a secret society. We do not say that no Christian can belong to a secret society; but we do say, that he cannot perform with fidelity his duties as a Christian and his duties as a member of a secret society. He cannot serve those two masters any more than he can serve God and Mammon. As a Christian, he is required to let his light shine, and so shine before men, that they may see his good works; and to propagate, and to assist others to propagate, the principles of his faith as extensively as possible. Can he do these things as an Odd Fellow? can he let his light shine and his good works be seen before men in a secret lodge room? Can he there propagate the principles of his faith as a Christian, and there show himself the Christian, the disciple of Jesus Christ; and even the minister of Christ, if he professes to be such? We answer without fear of contradiction—No. He cannot enter the lodge room as a professing Christian. His Saviour, his Christian profession, his Bible, as a special and exclusive revelation from God, and every thing peculiar to his faith and practice as a Christian must be left outside the lodge. He must disrobe himself of the dignity of a child of God, and present himself there on a perfect level with the heterogeneous and infidel mass who congregate there as a band of brothers. He cannot introduce there any topic for discussion pertaining to the Christian faith, nor even can he offer up prayer in the lodge room in the name of the Mediator, without giving offence. Should any one in the room be suddenly stricken down by the hand of God, and be supposed to be dying, and should he be alarmed for his soul, and inquire what he must do to be saved, no Christian, no Christian minister present can be allowed, according to the principles of the order, to point that dying man to the crucified One.

Now, are Christians justifiable in going where they cannot carry along with them their religion, and be openly and decidedly what they profess to be. Does the Saviour allow them to go where they cannot acknowledge him in all their ways. We know he does not. This is another reason why members of churches who join such societies should be considered subjects of discipline, and be dealt with for violating their Christian covenant.

But we are transcending the limits of an ordinary Circular Letter, and must of necessity leave out many important things, and draw to a close. We must notice one or two things further.

Those members of churches who join these societies to the grief of their brethren, as they generally do, violate a plain gospel rule. This they do, allowing the thing to be perfectly right in case it gave no offence. Giving offence is the wrong, and a wrong of sufficient magnitude to expel them from the church if persisted in. The following passages contain the rule: "But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died." "But it is evil for that man who eateth with offence. It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." (See Rom. 14th ch.) Again: "But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." (1st Cor., 8th ch.) This rule is plain. It is easy to be understood. Whatever we may do to the grief of our brethren, and which is not demanded of us as a duty, though there may be no wrong in the thing itself, it may be lawful, yet it is a violation of the rule. We sin against the brethren, and we sin against Christ. Hence those brethren who are in connection with secret societies, though we were to admit, which we cannot, that there is no evil in the thing itself, are violating this rule; and if they cannot be prevailed upon to desist—to come out from among them, and confess and forsake their wrong—it is manifest that they do not possess the spirit of Paul, and should be considered as subjects of gospel discipline. We are quite sure that no one who can say as Paul did, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend," will ever join a secret society, or do anything else which duty does not imperiously demand, to the grief of his brethren. He loves them more than any other class of men on earth, and feels a greater attachment to the Church of Christ than to any other body of men on earth.

7. Another thing we must not pass over; these societies make high pretensions to benevolence—call themselves benevolent societies, and claim to manifest the same spirit of benevolence that Christianity does, and sometimes to a far greater extent. We have not space to investigate this point as we would like. Suffice it to say, that we cannot but look on this as a libel on Christianity, and an imposition on the world. What they call benevolence no more resembles the benevolence of the Gospel of Christ than darkness resembles light. There is no more benevolence in them than there is in a fire insurance or life insurance company. All are founded on the same principle. When these societies relieve their needy and afflicted members, they but do what they have previously engaged to do, for a stipulated sum, which has been received. Those who belong to insurance companies, pay their money on condition of receiving aid in case they meet with disaster. Members of secret societies pay their money on the same condition. And you may with the same propriety say that a man who pays his honest debts is a benevolent man, as to say that a society is a benevolent society because it meets its engagements with the initiated, from whom value has been received. These societies are organized on principles of selfishness. Their object, as a general thing, is not to promote some great public enterprise, but the exclusive good of the fraternity. Hence the inducement held forth to young men to cast in their lot among them, and all have one purse, is not the prospect of doing good to others, but the personal benefit which this will be to them. It will be a great advantage. They will receive assistance in the ordinary business of life—as lawyers, doctors, merchants, mechanics, or of whatever profession they may be—they will be patronized by the Order in preference to all others; and if sick, and in want, they will be taken care of and provided for according to the rules of the institution. These things they do for the exclusive benefit of the initiated, and then, in their public journals and orations, trumpet them as deeds of charity. As well may they call the payment of an honest debt a deed of charity.

Some may object, and say that the society called "Sons of Temperance" is an exception to these remarks, for the object of that organization is to promote the temperance enterprise. We allow that this is their professed object, and that in some instances they do good by reclaiming the inebriate. But we doubt whether, on the whole, they have not done more injury to the cause than benefit. To promote any great public enterprise in which all the world is interested, we protest against its being necessary to get up secret societies. All who enlist in a good cause can do their duty in the broad light of day.

Finally, these societies, especially the society of Odd Fellows, authorize the holding of balls and other public amusements. According to the Constitution which the Grand Lodge of Northern New York has ordained for subordinate lodges, no subordinate lodge is allowed "to get up any ball or public amusement in the name of the Order, without permission of the Grand Lodge, or of the Grand Committee of the district." The Grand Lodge, therefore, does authorize subordinate lodges to get up balls and other public amusements in the name of the Order. We often hear of Odd Fellows' balls. These are authorized by the Grand Lodge, and are got up in the name of the Order. A mighty pious Order this, is it not? Does any man wonder that members of churches and ministers of the gospel should be induced by such a show of piety and good works to join such pious and benevolent institutions? Where can good men—men of God, men of prayer—find a better, a more congenial home, than in such a society as this, and to be permitted to join with them in their works of piety, for the good of the youth of our land, who delight in balls and parties of pleasure!

But to be serious, those members of churches who belong to these secret midnight clans, though they may not attend these balls and public amusements, yet they sanction those things, and by the whole weight of their influence they sustain them; and they are responsible to God for the tremendous evils resulting from such practices.

In conclusion, we say to all whom we address, in the language of Paul to the Ephesians, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."

☞ Persons indebted to the Publishing Society will allow us to remind them, that three numbers more will complete the tenth volume of the Sabbath Recorder, and that it would be a very great accommodation to us to have what is due thereon immediately. Further, we wish to remind subscribers for the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, that the third volume of that publication is half completed, and a large part of the expense for the year incurred; it is high time, therefore, to remit subscriptions therefor. A little attention to these things, on the part of each of our subscribers, would save us a great deal of trouble.

RELATION OF EARTHLY ATTACHMENTS TO THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

The remarks which have recently appeared in our columns upon Communion at the Lord's Table, have led, by a very natural association of ideas, to some thoughts upon the relation of things earthly to those which are heavenly. Not unfrequently has it been suggested, that for two persons closely connected by the ties of nature to be separated at the Lord's Table, because of their adhesion to different persuasions, is too painful to be endured. For a man to be unwilling to receive his wife at the same Communion Table with himself, because she belongs to another religious society; or for a parent to reject his child, or the child his parent, on the same ground; is thought to involve something so contrary to the general spirit of Christianity, that it cannot be otherwise than utterly wrong, not to say wicked. We are aware that this view makes a strong appeal to our natural partialities, and is all the more strong, because it appears to be justified by those amiable traits of character which the Scriptures themselves inculcate. For, that we should love with fond affection those of our own flesh and blood, is most clearly taught in the Word of God.

But with whatever fondness it is lawful to love the members of our own family, it is right that we should love God still better. He is to have the first place in our affections. And in this sinful world it is often necessary that we be put to the proof, whether we do really make Him the supreme object of regard, or whether we are placing some creature object above Him. It may indeed be a distressing thought, that our friends are separated from us at the Lord's Table; but the most painful feature of it is, or ought to be, that by a violation of His commandments they have created the necessity for this separation. A true Christian is distressed, when the members of his own family make void the Law of God; but when he comes to sit at the Lord's Table, his thoughts are not so much upon them, as upon Christ. He comes to the Table, not to commune with his friends, but with his Saviour. It is "the communion of the body of Christ." The cup of blessing is "the communion of the blood of Christ." The object is, primarily, to show forth the Lord's death, not to display our fondness for one another. And it is not a very rare thing for a Christian, at such times, to have his thoughts so completely engrossed with the love of Christ, as never to take a thought whether his wife and children, or any other of his earthly friends, are seated with him, or not. Christ fills all his soul, and he thinks of nothing else.

But we did not design to say so much on the subject of Communion, that point having been already pretty thoroughly discussed. There is another question, upon which our earthly partialities are often appealed to, upon a just decision of which hang some very important results. How can earthly relatives bear to be separated from each other in the future life? If the wife go to heaven, how can she endure the thought that her husband has gone down to hell? If the parents are happy in glory, how can they endure to think that their children are in torment? Would it not mar their happiness, and so destroy the very nature of heaven that it would be no heaven to them? Universalists ask such questions with a triumphant air.

Our answer is, that the relations alluded to are confined to this life. They are founded in the flesh, and can have no place in that kingdom into which flesh and blood cannot enter. The husband regards his wife, and the wife her husband, here in this world, with fond affection; but in the world to come they neither marry, nor are given in marriage. The relation ceases, and with it all its earthly partialities. Parents and children cling to one another here with strong adhesion; but there the relation will have come to an end. There God will be all in all, and every inhabitant of heaven will be so completely swallowed up in God, as to have no thought or concern about those earthly relations which once called forth the yearnings of his heart.

The relation of husband and wife is the foundation of all other earthly relations. In it all others originate. Yet it is very certain, that it could have no existence but for our bodily organization. The attachment of man and wife is not purely spiritual, and though out of the relation some affections grow which seem to be but remotely allied to the flesh, it is surely not too much to suppose, that when the relation ceases, as it will in the next world, all these affections will become extinct. At all events, the possibility of their becoming extinct ought not to be questioned by Universalists, who hold that, however strong the love of sin may be in the heart, it will be completely annihilated at death, and every one made holy and happy by the power of God.

LETTER FROM BRO. WARDNER.

A letter has been received from Bro. Nathan Wardner, dated Shanghae, Jan. 15, 1854. Most of it is occupied with an Essay on Budhism, read by Rev. Mr. Culbertson at a missionary meeting of inquiry held in Shanghae on the first Monday evening in January. The essay will appear in the Recorder, probably next week. Meanwhile we give the closing paragraphs of Bro. W's. letter:—

It is reported that about 500 of the rebels in the city of Shanghae have deserted recently, besides whom about 150 were beheaded, who were detected to be in a conspiracy with the imperialists. It is also reported, that they eat the hearts of all spies whom they apprehend. About fifteen of the pirate junks employed by the imperialists have lately left. When they left Canton for this place, they numbered sixty odd sail; but in consequence of depredations which they committed on the way, they were pursued by one of the English steamers, and twenty-two of them were sunk.

There is beginning to be great distress here among the common people. It is reported that some in the city have been driven to such extremities as to feed upon their own children. The American missionaries have held meetings, and are now circulating a subscription paper among the merchants, in order to afford some relief to these sufferers, both in and out of the city.

On the 5th of January, I visited my house at Catherine's Bridge, and in going passed between the batteries of the belligerents (at the little south gate) which were only fifteen or twenty rods apart, and were at the time having a great war of words, daring and insulting each other. The next day a band of imperial soldiers broke into my inclosures and plundered to some extent. Since that I have been laid up with inflammation in my eyes, so that I have not yet been to see how much mischief was done. I am now beginning to use my eyes a little, and shall probably go soon. Last evening I heard that another cannon ball had struck my house, but have not learned the amount of damage it has done.

There was rather a sanguinary battle fought on the 13th, outside the north gate, when the rebels sallied out and met the imperialists hand to hand.

It is the general impression, that the city will soon fall into the hands of the imperialists again, unless Tae-ping-wong should send and take possession. It is hardly to be questioned, that the present occupants are not recognized or countenanced by the patriot party.

The French ambassadors who lately visited Nanking say that the patriots take their Sabbath from their ancestors, "who," they say, "worshiped Shangte and kept the seventh day."

About the last of November, Mrs. W. received a donation of fifty dollars from an anonymous contributor, to aid her in getting up a school of Chinese girls. This came through the instrumentality of Mrs. Dr. Hall, an American friend, who accidentally found out that Mrs. W. was anxious for such a school, and she herself added ten dollars to the sum; since which Mrs. Baylis has added another ten, which will be sufficient for one year. She will open her school as soon as possible after peace is restored.

MONUMENTS TO THE DEAD.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In looking over the pages of the Recorder of April 13th, my eye caught with surprise and astonishment the words, "Monument to Eld. Cochran." On reading the notice with avidity, my mind fell into a revery, somewhat as follows: Would Bro. Cochran, if he could speak to us from the cold and silent tomb, say, Build me a monument; or, could he speak to us from the mansions of bliss and happiness, would he say, Build me a monument, that I may live in the memory of my brethren on earth? I think not. Having been personally acquainted with him a long time, even from the time he became a member of our denomination, and knowing his views on reform and economy, and his great desire for the spread of the gospel, and the melioration of the condition of his fellow men, whether white, black, red, bond, or free, methinks I can hear him say, Appropriate your time, talents, and money, to a better purpose; I live in the memory of my brethren and friends, indelibly printed on their hearts; therefore away with these distinctions of earth, and wordly-minded men; it is all vanity, vanity; save your money to send the gospel to the heathen, help the distressed, the bondman, the enslaved; remember our brethren scattered here and there, without a pastor or any to dispense the word of life to them; save your money and appropriate it for these humane purposes; I want nothing added to my grave, save a plain slab, with the usual marks to distinguish it from others.

I should be as glad as any one (probably) to build a monument in memory of Bro. Cochran, if I could believe it to be right; but I cannot. A few reasons I will give you now; and, first, it would be contrary to the gospel of our Redeemer. I know not that there was any monument built by the primitive disciples to any of their revered pastors, or even to the apostles. Did they say that such a thing should, or might be done? I answer, No. Is it not one of the relics of Rome, the mother of harlots? I am confident it would be contrary to the mind of our departed brother, and that if he were here to speak to us now, he would say, Refrain. If so, would it not be wrong to do it? Second—Would it not be setting a bad example, a ruinous precedent? Will it not create in the minds of the brethren throughout the denomination a spirit of emulation? Every revered and departed minister and worthy deacon must then have a monument; and wealthy brethren, that have given much for benevolent purposes, must have a monument; so thousands of dollars may be taken from the fund for benevolent objects, and thrown away; yea, worse than thrown away; for, if this business of building monuments be established, the curse of God will follow us. Look at the thousands who need the necessaries of this life, and much more the word of life dispensed to them, and cannot have it for the lack of money—yea, many of our own denomination cannot have the word preached to them, because they have not the money. Then why squander your money upon this sinful project? I would implore the Committee and brethren who are in the lead in this matter, to pause and ponder well before they take another step.

THE MISSIONARY WORK.

The arrival in this country of Rev. Dr. Duff, a veteran missionary, suggested the idea of a Union Missionary Convention, which was held recently in New York City. The Convention discussed several questions of general interest, and came to the following conclusions:—

The first question propounded at it was: To what extent are we authorized to expect the conversion of the world to Christ?

The resolution in response was: All men shall be blessed in Jesus Christ; all nations, and the whole earth, shall call him blessed.

Second Question: What are the divinely appointed and most efficient means of extending the Gospel to all men? Answer: By teaching and prayer by duly qualified ministers and others, applied by the Grace of the Holy Ghost; by spreading the Word of God and evangelical books, and other evangelical instrumentalities; also by a race of native missionaries and teachers.

Third Question: Is it better to concentrate or scatter laborers? Answer: Duly qualified and unrestrained itinerancy is approved; yet it is desirable to seize commanding stations, especially where hereditary concentrated systems of error have long prevailed.

Fourth Question: Is it expedient for different Missionary Boards to plant stations on the same ground? Answer: Considering the vast extent of the unevangelical world and the limited means of evangelization it is desirable, with the exception of great centers, that a sufficient preöccupation by any Church should be left undisturbed.

Fifth Question: How may missionaries best be multiplied and prepared? Answer: In the absence of sufficient data the conviction is, that ministers must strive more vividly to realize the grandeur of their enterprise, and privately to impress the same, considering personal dedication as the highest duty; also, that a course of evangelistic theology should be adopted in seminaries.

Sixth Question: Is it expedient to hold such meetings as this annually? Answer: A similar one shall be held next year.

THE JEWS OF PALESTINE.

The President and Trustees of the American Relief Society for the Indigent Jews in Jerusalem have issued an address to their co-religionists throughout the United States, on the subject of the deep distress which is now devastating the land of Israel's past and future glory. "Poverty threatens to hasten the death of the pious pilgrims scattered through the four cities associated in holiness, who, in their dire condition, appeal in words that rend the hearts of all gifted to feel, for immediate relief from the horrors which encompass them. The Trustees have not the heart to place before their fellow Israelites the picture of woe brought to their view in well authenticated documents; it will suffice to show the extent of the distress by the following extracts. Sir Moses Montefiore, Bart., in answer to a draft sent by the Society, writes: 'The distress of Israel at the present moment is truly heartrending. The high price of provisions and house rent, the diminution of the usual revenues for the poor, afford the best evidences of the state of the indigent.' The House of Leheren, at Amsterdam, appeal in the fervent words of patriotism for the relief of the poor in Palestine, and state that 'nearly half of the usual revenue will now be taken from the Jews in the Orient, by the ukase of the Czar prohibiting his Jewish subjects from transmitting any money to Jerusalem.' Leon Dyer, Esq., a respected citizen of Baltimore, writes, 'Were I to describe the misery endured by the poor Jews, it would scarcely be credited; yet it is increased a thousand fold at the present moment, owing to the unparalleled high price of food, which has caused numbers to die of starvation, and many more must share the like fate, unless relief comes from some quarter. The small-pox has been raging at Jerusalem since the middle of Dec., and when we left, January 17th, its virulence had not abated. Seven-eighths of the Jews in Palestine depend on support from abroad, which, at best, does not half supply their wants, and to which our happy country contributes a very small portion.'"

THE NEBRASKA BILL.

This iniquitous bill is again before Congress, the House of Representatives having taken it up in Committee of the Whole, laying aside, by a concerted vote, many other important bills to give this precedence. What will be the result, it is not easy to foresee. The opponents of the bill doubtless have it in their power to prevent final action, but whether they will be sufficiently united and determined to do so, is a question. It is quite possible that at some midnight hour, when the opposition is jaded out, or members are unwittingly absent, the measure may be consummated. Meanwhile the following paragraph from the N. Y. Tribune of the 12th inst. showing the effect of the Nebraska discussion, is worth considering:—

"We challenge the curious annals of history for a more striking progressive change in the sentiment of a nation than that which has taken place in regard to Abolition, pure and simple, in the free States of America. A few years ago and the name of abolitionist was identified with social outlawry. Southern States put a price on the head of Garrison; southern Post-Offices opened letters and papers; and Committees of northern safety-men burned abolition journals by the heap; mobs drove the emancipation apostle from Baltimore—burned down a Liberty-Hall in Philadelphia—shot down Lovejoy for printing and speaking democracy—and everywhere persecuted the name, fame and persons of the abolitionists. Three years ago a mob, broke up their meeting at the Tabernacle, and fairly pursued them from the city. Two years ago they could not obtain here a place to assemble in, and were obliged to go to Syracuse to hold their Anniversary. But now all this is changed. They are welcomed to one of the largest and handsomest churches in New York, and for the past two days their discussions have not only been entirely undisturbed, but have been attended by crowded and sympathetic audiences of the most respectable people. Even conservatism and moderation now listen without a shock to the bold utterances of these quondam fanatics. Such is the effect produced by the conviction which is now gaining complete possession of the public mind at the North, that the South is faithless to its own pledges and is resolved to extend the area of Slavery at whatever risk. This great change has been wrought by the Nebraska bill, and as yet we are only at the beginning.

ANNIVERSARY STATISTICS.

The Anniversary Exercises in New York this year differed little in manner and matter from those of previous years. Perhaps the Reformatory and Anti-Slavery Societies attracted some more attention than usual, and exercised a larger liberty of discussion. The national Societies for Missionary and kindred purposes enjoyed the presence and aid of several distinguished speakers, among whom were Dr. Duff and Rev. Mr. Oncken, both long and successful laborers in the missionary field. As a whole, the "season" seems to have been one of about average interest. We give below the Statistics of several of the larger Societies.

Seamen's Friend Society.

The American Seamen's Friend Society held its 26th Anniversary in New York, May 8th. An abstract of the Annual Report was read on the occasion, from which we obtain the following statistics:—

The Sailor's Home in Cherry-st., after having been occupied eleven years, has been thoroughly repaired and refurnished. The number of boarders received during the year has been 3,460; the whole number since the house was opened, in twelve years, 40,056. The number of ship-wrecked and destitute received and relieved during eleven months of the year is 140, at an expense of $646 68.

The Seamen's Savings Bank in Wall-st. has over $2,000,000 on deposit belonging to seamen. On fifteen consecutive days within the year, $40,000 were deposited exclusviely by them—facts that show some improvement.

The total receipts into the treasury during the year ending April 30 were $27,724 91; an increase of $2,441 29 over the receipts of last year. The expenditures during the same time have been $27,389 60; leaving a balance in the treasury of $335 31. This amount does not include the receipts of local societies on the seaboard and at the West, which must amount in the aggregate to over $60,000 a year for current expenses, besides over $65,000, raised most of it during the past two years, for the erection of Sailor's Homes and Bethels.

New York State Colonization Society.

This Society held its 22d anniversary on the 9th of May, when the Recording Secretary, read an abstract of the annual report. The report stated that several important discoveries had taken place in Central Africa, calculated to enlarge the field of enterprise and philanthropy; that by the activity of squadrons on the coast, and by treaties with native kings, the slave trade had been materially diminished and the condition of the natives much improved; that, notwithstanding various obstacles, there had been a most encouraging increase of available means over the previous year, or any year for a long time, the working capital of the year being $71,953 75; that the number of emigrants had been equally augmented, 783 emigrants having embarked for Liberia within the past year, an increase of 200 upon the preceding twelve months; and that all the reports have been most flattering, and all communications from Liberia were such as to gratify the earnest desires of the friends of the cause.

American and Foreign Christian Union.

The 5th anniversary of this institution was held May 9th.

The Annual Report states that the year has been marked by general prosperity and an advance on the part of the Society upon the operations of the preceding year. The entire number connected with the Society in all its branches for the whole or part of the year at home and abroad is 123, of these, 92 have been in the home and 31 in the foreign fields.

The balance in the Treasury, April 1, 1853, was $3,863 83. The receipts to April 1, 1854, were $75,701 08, making the resources for the year, $79,561 91. The payments during the time were $76,875 62, leaving a balance April 1, 1854, of $2,685 29. The outstanding debts on that day, on account of the ordinary business of the Society, portions of which were daily falling due, were $9,078 32.

The service in the Mission department has been chiefly among the foreign Papal population, who have sought a home in our land, and freedom from the despotism of the land of their birth. It has been rendered in fourteen States, distributed among the northern, southern, eastern and western sections of the Union—chiefly in the cities and large towns and manufacturing districts. The missionaries have preached the Gospel in the German, French, Italian, Spanish, Irish and English languages. A few have had charge of organized churches, but the most have labored in other relations, as evangelists and Bible-readers, and sought to lead the people to attend the churches already in existence. They report many conversions, and multitudes collected into Sunday-schools, and Bible-classes, and evangelical places of worship. They belong to nine different evangelical denominations, and are happily and heartily united in this great and glorious work.

In 1790 there were but about 40 Roman Catholic priests in the entire country. In 1808, the system in its organized form, comprised 1 diocese, 2 bishops, 68 priests, 80 churches, 2 ecclesiastical institutions, 1 college, and 2 female academies. In 1854, it comprises 7 archbishops, 32 bishops, 1,574 priests, 1,712 churches, 41 dioceses, 2 apostolic vicarates, 20 colleges with 2,247 students, 112 female academies. It has 20 weekly periodicals, 1 monthly, 1 quarterly, and 2 annuals, published in English, French and German. The entire Papal population of the country is about 3,000,000, or one-eighth part of the whole nation. From 1834 to 1844, the personal and material force of the Romish Church in the United States increased at the rate of about 100 per cent.; during the last ten years, nearly the same ratio is observable, except in the number of churches and priests. In these, the ratio of increase has been about 170 per cent.

American Home Mission Society.

The 28th anniversary of the American Home Mission Society was held May 9th.

From an abstract of the Annual Report we learn that the Society has had in its service 1,049 ministers of the Gospel, in 27 different States and Territories. Of the whole number 590 have been the pastors or stated supplies of single congregations; 280 have ministered to two or three congregations each; and 177 have extended their labors over still wider fields. Ten missionaries have preached to congregations of colored people, and 65 in foreign languages—18 to Welsh, and 40 to German congregations; and others to congregations of Norwegians, Swedes, Swiss, Hollanders and Frenchmen.

The number of congregations and missionary stations supplied, in whole or in part, is 2,140.

The aggregate of ministerial labor performed, is equal to 870 years.

The number of pupils in Sunday-schools is 65,400.

There have been added to the churches 6,625, viz: 3,310 on profession, and 2,715 by letter. Sixty-two missionaries make mention in their reports of revivals of religion in their congregations, and 374 missionaries report 2,816 hopeful conversions. Fifty churches have been organized by the missionaries during the year, and 45 that had been dependent, have assumed the support of their own ministry. Sixty-five houses of worship have been completed, 49 repaired, and 88 others are in the process of erection.

Ninety-seven young men, in connection with the missionary churches, are in preparation for the gospel ministry.

Receipts, $191,209 07; liabilities, $195,476 64. Payments—$184,025 76, leaving $11,450 88 still due to missionaries for labor performed; toward canceling which, and meeting the further claims on commissions not yet expired, amounting in all to $85,191 48, there is a balance in the treasury of $14,385 46; the greater part of it received in payment of legacies near the close of the year.

The receipts exceed those of any former year, by $19,474 83; the principal part of the increase being from the regular contributions of the churches.

The American Tract Society.

The 29th Anniversary was held on the 10th inst. From the Annual Report we gather the following statistical results of the year:—

New Publications 76, in seven languages, of which 19 are volumes; total publications 1,912, of which 397 are volumes; total approved for circulation abroad, in about 119 languages and dialects, 2,885, of which 282 are volumes. Of the American Messenger, upward of 200,000 are printed monthly; of the Child's Paper, more than 250,000; of the German Messenger, about 25,000.

Circulated during the year 10,334,718 publications, including 1,046,544 volumes, and embracing 315,100,857 pages. Total since the formation of the Society, 148,228,198 publications, including 9,463,374 volumes. Gratuitous distributions for the year, in six thousand and forty-nine distinct grants by the Committee, 65,372,069 pages, besides 7,852,755 to Life Directors and Life Members; value nearly $50,000.

Receipts, in donations, $156,033 48, including $27,864 88 in legacies; for sales, including periodicals, $259,125 12; total, $415,370 21. Expenditures, for publishing books and periodicals, $244,426 42; for colportage, $91,218 62; cash remitted to foreign and pagan lands, $20,000; total expended, $406,703 17.

Number of colporteurs laboring the whole or part of the year, 619, of whom 120 labored among the foreign population, and 88 were students from colleges and theological seminaries. They visited 568,032 families, with 265,500 of whom they conversed on personal religion or prayed. They found 92,531 families who habitually neglected evangelical preaching, 54,980 families of Roman Catholics, 49,935 families destitute of all religious books but the Bible, and 30,694 destitute of the Bible. The number of meetings addressed or prayer-meetings held by them was 12,706.

The American Bible Society.

The American Bible Society held its 38th Anniversary on the 11th inst.

The receipts of the year for general objects of the Society amount to $394,340 50, being an increase over last year of $47,798 08.

The number of Bibles printed during the year is 306,000, and of Testaments 556,000; making a total of 862,000.

The number of volumes issued is 815,399, being an increase of 16,029, and would have been larger but for the unavoidable suspension of operations for six weeks, owing to our removal to our new premises. The entire number of volumes issued since the formation of the Society is 9,903,751.

The Society has at present thirty-four Agents employed, including two in Texas, one in California, and one in Oregon.

Plates have been prepared for a new edition of the 12 mo. Nonpareil Bible; of the New Testament in Spanish; and the Testament in Welsh and English, in parallel columns. The Standard Imperial Quarto Bible for pulpits, in type larger than pica, is stereotyped, and will be ready for distribution in a few months.

The Library contains nearly 2,000 volumes, many of them of great interest and value.

Besides the grants of books, $28,189 have been granted by the Board in money to aid in publishing the Scriptures in foreign lands, especially in China, Northern and Southern India, and in Turkey, Greece, France, and Germany, under the direction of various Missionary Boards and Bible Societies.

SCHOOL OF COLORED PEOPLE.—The Colored People of this Country propose to establish an Industrial School in the neighborhood of Erie, Pa., as soon as they can raise $30,000 to do it with. It is to be based on a farm of not less than two hundred acres, one hundred and fifty of them sacredly reserved for Agriculture; males and females to be equally employed as teachers and received as pupils; no distinctions or exclusions to be made on account of color; the School is to be managed by fifteen Trustees, six of them appointed by the Committee on Education of the National Council, and nine chosen by the stockholders. Frederick Douglass is General Agent to solicit subscriptions. In organizing the School, these principles are to be strictly enforced:

"1. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

"2. Each pupil shall occupy one half his time, when at School, in work at some handicraft, or on the farm.

"3. The handicrafts shall be such that their products will be articles saleable for cash, or money's worth, at a market within easy access from the School."

THE MISERIES OF WAR.—Rev. W. G. Schauffler, missionary at Constantinople, has issued an appeal to the people of this country for immediate aid to supply the destitute poor of that city. One paragraph from his appeal will give some idea of the miseries which follow in the track of war:—

"There is no commerce, no business going on here now, no money except paper to be seen, and of that but little, and thousands are sinking down with hunger, thirst, nakedness, and disease. We have heard of people who were dying with hunger, stealing bread, and on being detected, sinking down in the streets and expiring. We have heard of their eating, already, rats and mice; we are entreated by people who used to be well off, to give them a piece of bread for their starving children. Now, my dear sir, will you and other wealthy Christians think of this? Will you extend a helping hand to these poor, wretched people? I have lived above twenty years in this city, through wars, plague, cholera, and fires, often, but I have never heard of such distress as now."

THE HOLY LAND.—A letter from one of the American travelers in the Holy Land gives a melancholy account of the present condition of affairs there. The Turkish troops having been withdrawn to fight the Russians, anarchy, disorder, and violence of all kinds, are prevailing. Many of the inhabitants have taken refuge in the walled towns, and the peasants, as they work in the fields, have with them their arms loaded for an encounter. Bands of Bedouin robbers traverse the country in every direction, and the party to which the writer was attached was attacked, and one of them wounded. Thus, while Europe is about to plunge into a war, originating in the question as to the control of the Holy Places, the inhabitants of that region are left at the mercy of the spoiler. In one case it is stated that forty men and two women were massacred by a party of Bedouin vagabonds.

THE CITIES OF THE PLAIN.—M. de Saulcy, in 1851, announced to the Institute of France, that he had found, on the southern shores of the Dead Sea, four of the five cities mentioned in Genesis, chap. xiv., namely, Sodom, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, and the ruins of Gomorrah at the north-western extremity of the lake. The Chevalier Van de Velde, of Utrecht, a member of the Palestine Archæological Association, and who lately returned from Palestine, read at its last meeting a paper disproving M. de Saulcy's statements. He states that he crossed the plain which M. de Saulcy takes to be the plain of Sodom, and where, he says, he found a number of rows of large stones, which he believed to be the ruins of Sodom; that he recognized these rows of large stones to be merely stones brought down by the winter torrents, which empty themselves into this plain from the surrounding mountains.

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The anniversary exercises of the Union Theological Seminary in the city of New York were held on the 8th inst. Short addresses were delivered by six members of the graduating class, and a farewell address by Rev. Dr. Robinson. The following is a list of the graduates, six of whom, it is announced, have determined to devote themselves to the missionary work:—

A. G. Beebee,
W. T. McElroy,
W. S. Karr,
J. M. Carroll,
J. W. Moseley,
E. P. Larkin,
L. H. Cone,
S. Richardson,
H. A. Lounsbury,
G. E. Eagleton,
T. E. Skinner,
J. L. Lyons,
T. N. Haskell,
W. E. Caldwell,
W. E. Merriman,
M. Kellogg,
V. D. Collins,
F. Overton,
P. J. Leo,
L. F. Dudley,
O. H. Seymour,
W. W. Ludden,
W. Frear,
C. C. Starbuck,
J. S. Zelie.

PRACTICAL PROHIBITION.—Ten towns in Jefferson County—viz. Watertown, Adams, Lorraine, Rodman, Henderson, Brownville, Theresa, and Rutland—have decided that no licenses shall be granted for the sale of intoxicating drinks. In Oneida County, also, in four towns—viz. Boonville, Remsen, Steuben, and Trenton—the Boards of Excise have refused to grant any licenses. This is practical prohibition, and shows that the people are far in advance of the Legislature.

☞ ELD. DANIEL BABCOCK having moved from Johnstown Center to Milton, Rock Co., Wisconsin, requests his correspondents to address him at the latter place.

The Congregational church and society, in Beverly, Mass.; the Congregational church and society in Wenham; the Congregational church and society in Hamilton; the Congregational church and society in Rowley, have recently added from one to two hundred dollars to the salaries of their pastors.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 8.

In the SENATE, a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury was laid before that body in reply to the Senate's resolution, of the amount of stock and other Government securities redeemed since the 3d of March, 1853, by which it appears that the whole amount of stock redeemed is $18,813,714 75; premium paid on the same, $2,657,902 93. The Chair also presented a message from the President, transmitting copies of the correspondence of our late Minister at Berlin with the King of Prussia, respecting religious toleration, &c. Mr. Fish presented the memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce, that treaties be made with the European powers to put on a more secure footing the rights of neutrals, &c., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. Cass presented two memorials in favor of religious freedom, and intimated that he would like to speak on the subject next Second-day. Mr. Douglas read the remonstrance of certain clergymen of the Northwestern States against the Nebraska bill. The vetoed Insane Land bill was postponed. The Homestead bill came up as the special order, and was debated at some length, but was finally postponed.

The HOUSE, on motion of Mr. Richardson of Illinois, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, when all business on the calendar was laid aside, and the Nebraska bill was taken up. The vote on Mr. Richardson's motion stood, Yeas 109, Nays 88. Mr. Caleb Lyon of New York then addressed the House in opposition to the measure until the adjournment of that body.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 9.

In the SENATE, a report was received from the Auditor of the Treasury, inclosing a statement of receipts and expenditures for the Post Office Department for the year 1853. Numerous memorials were presented, including several against the passage of the Nebraska bill. Two thousand copies of the report relative to the exploring cruise of the brig Dolphin were ordered to be printed. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Indian Appropriation bill was taken up. The amendment to pay $500,000 to the Creek Indians for land taken from them in the war of 1812, was debated till three o'clock, when the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE, at an early hour, resumed the consideration of the Nebraska bill. Mr. Ingersoll of Conn. made a speech relative to the European war. He urged the unanimous declaration by Congress of our neutral rights, and that "free ships make free goods—no papers overhauled but ship's papers." Mr. Perkins of La. followed in a speech denouncing England and France for their interference in the Cuban question. Mr. Zollicoffer of Tenn. then addressed the Committee in favor of the Nebraska bill. Messrs. Walley of Mass. and Simmons of New York followed in opposition, and Mr. Cox of Ky. in favor of the measure. At nine o'clock Mr. Ball of Ohio obtained the floor and made a strong speech in opposition to the bill. He considered the bill as a gross outrage and wrong on the people of the North, threatening the peace of the whole country. At ten o'clock in the evening the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 10.

In the SENATE, Mr. Morton reported a resolution in favor of discharging the Committee on Agricultural Affairs from the further consideration of the subject of breaking up the monopoly enjoyed by the British Government in the guano trade of Peru, and referring the matter to the President. Mr. Morton from, the Committee on Agriculture, also reported in favor of the establishment of Agricultural Schools. After considerable discussion, 37,000 extra copies of the Agricultural Report of the Commissioner of Patents, were ordered to be printed. An ineffectual attempt was made to take up the President's veto of the Insane Land bill. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Richardson of Illinois gave notice of his intention to introduce, today, a motion to close the debate on the Nebraska bill, but he did not state on what day he desired the debate to terminate. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Nebraska bill. Mr. Bayly of Va. having the floor, spoke in favor of the bill; and Mr. Grow of Pa. followed. Messrs. Seward of Ga., Elliott of Ky., Dowdell of Ala., Carpenter and Tweed of New York, spoke in favor of the bill; and Messrs. Perkins of New York, Elliot of Mass., Farley of Me., and Harrison of Ohio, spoke against it, and at a late hour the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 11.

In the SENATE, Mr. Bright offered a resolution directing the Secretary of the Senate to contract with the Editors of the Sentinel for publishing the debates of the Senate in that paper, which was debated for an hour, and then laid over. The vetoed Insane Land bill was taken up, and Mr. Badger addressed the Senate at length in support of the constitutionality of the bill, when its further consideration was postponed.

In the HOUSE, the Nebraska question came up immediately after the assembling of that body, on a resolution offered by Mr. Richardson to terminate the debate on the Nebraska bill on Sixth-day, at 12 o'clock. The entire day and evening was consumed in motions of various kinds, debates touching questions of order, calls of the House, appeals, &c. The session was one of intense excitement, but no definite result was arrived at.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 12.

The SENATE met at the usual hour, but upon the roll being called, it was ascertained that a quorum was not in attendance, and after the presentation of several petitions against the Nebraska bill, adjourned over until Second-day.

The HOUSE was in uninterrupted session from Sixth-day forenoon, considering Mr. Richardson's motion to terminate debate on the Nebraska bill. Innumerable votes by yeas and nays on motions to adjourn and on other minor questions were taken, but nothing done, and the struggle was waged fiercely until eleven and-a-half o'clock Sixth-day night, when the motion to adjourn until Second-day was finally carried.

European News.

The steamer Canada, with European news to April 29th, arrived at Boston, May 11.

There is no intelligence of the missing steamer City of Glasgow.

The news from the seat of war indicates increased vigor on the part of the allies. Twenty thousand French and 8,000 English troops had landed at Gallipoli.

No event of importance had occurred. A sanguinary engagement had taken place near Kalafat without decisive results.

It was reported that the Russians had been defeated at Pattschernaroda, and that they had evacuated Little Wallachia.

Sir Charles Napier was at Stockholm on the 27th of April, and his fleet was about fifty miles off.

The allied fleets in the Black Sea were at anchor off Odessa on the 26th of April.

The British steamer Fury, of six guns, on the 11th April, steamed under American colors within three miles of the entrance of Sebastopol, where she saw two merchantmen, two brigs, two frigates and a steamer, leaving the harbor. The Fury dashed in and seized one of the merchant ships and towed her off. The Russians gave chase, and the Fury was finally obliged to cut the prize adrift, but not until one of the frigates and the steamer came within range and exchanged shots. The Fury, after four hours chase, succeeded in eluding the Russians and carried off the merchant-ship's crew as prisoners, who gave important information respecting the strength of Sebastopol.

A bold and successful feat is also recorded of the Russians. A steamship supposed to be a Russian dispatch vessel, under British colors, boldly steamed from the Archipelago, passed the Dardanelles and batteries, and succeeded in escaping into the Black Sea.

Six of the twelve Russian merchant ships captured by British cruisers had arrived in England. Their crews were liberated on parole not to serve against England or France.

On the 26th ultimo a sharp combat took place before Kalafat. Twenty squadrons of Russians, with six guns, were making a reconnoisance of the Turkish lines, when the Turks sallied out with two regiments of regulars and some Bayouks and cannon, and, after a combat of three hours duration, obliged the Russians to retreat with a loss of 500 men.

Accounts from Circassia of the 1st of April, state that the insurrection against Russia is becoming general among all the warlike tribes of the Caucuses.

The expulsion of the Greeks from Turkey continues. Their stores and dwellings, in which some arms were found, have been seized and closed up.

The steamer Ercolarco was lost off Villa Franca, Italy. Fifteen English passengers were drowned, and five saved. Among them was Sir Robert Peel.

A revolution is reported at Ava. The Prince had poisoned his brother, and seized the throne.

Four Days Later.

The steamer Atlantic, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on Second-day afternoon, May 18th.

By this arrival we have accounts of the bombardment of Odessa by a portion of the allied fleet. One account says that it continued two hours; another, ten hours. "A battery of four guns was destroyed, and one Austrian ship and eight Russian merchant ships in harbor were burned."

On the 28th of April, the Bremen bark Favorite, with 180 passengers on board, was run into and sunk by the American bark Hesper, in the English Channel. Some of the passengers took to the boats and have not been heard from; many others probably went down with the vessel.

California News.

California dates to April 15th, two weeks later, have been received since our last.

On the 13th of April, the steamers Secretary and Nevada left San Francisco for Petaluma. While crossing San Pablo Bay, the Secretary burst her boiler, carrying death and destruction in every part of the boat to the passengers, of whom a large number were on board. So great was the force of the explosion, that the boat was literally blown to pieces. Many persons were blown overboard and their bodies not recovered. The following is a correct list of killed and missing, as far as ascertained: Theodore A. Bourse, Geo. Clark, Jessie Potter, Mrs. Hillmans and child, James Wright, Mr. Bessin (Engineer,) Miller, (deck hand,) John Ebbetts, W. H. Tripp, Thomas Cameron, Emma Holmes, G. P. Henry, (fireman,) Cook (name unknown,) deck hand (wounded,) Mrs. Day and child, J. Parlthrop, Mr. Lundy, Mrs. Hillman, J. D. Cookinsham, Chas. Smith, G. Walker, D. Johnson, D. H. Van Buren, Lewis Johnson, Jas. MacGuire, Edward Bruce Bracket, Mrs. Harden, Richard A. Lewis, Lewis Lamberton (clerk) J. A. Shorley, Judge Ferrill, Mr. William Lundy, wife and child; Geo. Robertson, C. W. Rodgers, E. H. Snyder, S. H. Fenill, E. Travers, (Capt.,) E. A. James, and R. Pudder.

The Governor of California has addressed a message to the Legislature, recommending a restriction upon the price of steamboat fare. A large company has obtained possession of all the steamboats on the interior waters of the State, and of course, charge their own prices, which are entirely too high to be popular.

It appears that there is to be no end to the Indian difficulties. In the south, particularly at the Indian Reserve on the Tejon, the red men are in peace, but in the North, on the Pitt and McCloud rivers, there is a continued state of hostility. A battle, or rather a massacre, occurred lately, in which fifteen Indians were killed. Since the beginning of winter sixty-five McCloud Indians and forty-nine Pitt Indians have been shot down. Their offense is stealing.

Diggings which pay $3 and $4 a day, have been discovered on Russian river, about 40 miles northwest of Sonoma. About 400 miners are at work there, and the number is increasing. These mines are near the extensive farming districts of Russian River, Bodega, and Santa Rosa.

We have Oregon dates to March 25, one week later. The subject of a State Government is the all-absorbing topic—having both warm supporters and strong opponents. Over ten millions of bushels of wheat will be harvested during the coming season.

We have dates from Honolulu to the 23d March. The King has called the Legislature to meet on the 8th of April. The census returns of the islands have been published. The total population is 71,019, of whom 37,079 are males and 2,118 are foreigners.

Hamburg ship Wilhelmsburg arrived at San Francisco on the morning of April 15, from China, bringing files to the 27th of January, being but a few days later than previously published. She brough 571 Chinese passengers, of whom 100 are females.

THE NEWLY-DISCOVERED PALACE.—Of one of the slabs taken from a buried palace recently opened near Nineveh, a missionary correspondent of the Independent gives the following account:—

"The most interesting yet uncovered is an extensive lion-hunt, in which the king is engaged personally—in one case piercing a fleeing lion with an arrow, in another thrusting a dagger into him in a hand-to-hand fight, and in a third, quietly spitting with his spear an enraged beast that is leaping upon the chariot. In all, there are some thirty lions pictured; some dead; some, pierced with arrows, vomiting up blood; some in cages, and one in the act of springing from his cage through a trap-door opened by a concealed eunuch. This shows that the game was either reared for the chase, or caught and kept till the king's pleasure. On one slab seems a picture of royal pleasure-grounds, exhibiting large columns rising from human-headed bulls, and from lions; also a series of pointed arches, very sharp. In another place, the king is seen through a city gate-way, hunting in the distance—the first instance of an attempt at perspective."

THE DANGERS OF THE SEA.—The Report of the Seamen's Friend Society furnishes some very striking facts illustrative of the dangers of the sea. From it we learn that the past year has been peculiarly marked with storms, and wrecks, and disasters, and deaths on the sea. Seventy ships, 61 barques, 107 brigs, 232 schooners, and 11 steamers—in all, 481 vessels, are reported as lost, most of them total wrecks. Of five ships, five barques, nine brigs, thirteen schooners, and one steamer, the record is, "sailed at a certain date, and have not been heard of since." In these wrecks nearly 850 lives are known to have been lost. There could not have been less than 700 on board the 32 missing vessels.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.—The late frosts injured peaches nearly all over the United States, yet the crop is not wholly cut off, and in some localities will be good. At Terre Haute, Ind., they are exulting over the prospect of a good crop of all kinds of fruit. On the Ohio River, below Cincinnati, they are laughing out of the other corner of their mouths. Most of the peaches, cherries, and strawberries in that neighborhood have been killed; apples are yet safe.

In Ohio the prospect of a good crop is much more flattering than it was a few weeks ago. In Southern Michigan, late travelers tell us the wheat looks well. It is not quite so promising in the central parts of the State, particularly on old land.

The Wheat Crop in Eastern Virginia promises finely. The weather is similar to that three years ago, when the crop was very large.

In Wisconsin, a recent traveler says he did not see a single poor field of wheat. On the Wabash the crop is also good. So it is at Springfield, Ill.

Green Peas and Strawberries are sent north from Norfolk by every steamer, a thousand barrels at a time.

SUMMARY.

The Industrial League of Illinois, chartered at the last session of the Legislature, is making efforts to awaken the public interest in favor of and finally secure legislative action to appropriate the fund of about $150,000, which the State now has, to establish a "State Industrial University," where the students shall be thoroughly instructed in all the various branches of industry, such as agricultural, mechanical, mercantile pursuits, &c., and where they shall have all the advantages that science can afford, and also have connected with the Institution a State Normal School for the purpose of educating teachers of Common Schools, and preparing them to impart instruction to their pupils in all these branches, which are designed to be strictly practical in every particular.

A bright and interesting little girl, about eight years of age, died recently in the village of Newark from convulsions, brought on by excessive exertions in "jumping the rope." She was competing with several of her school companions in this exercise, who were endeavoring to outdo each other in endurance. She jumped four hundred times in succession, and until entirely overcome by the long continued exertions. The child was taken home insensible, but the movement of the muscles of the limbs, as in jumping, continued without cessation forty-eight hours, until the sufferer was released from the painful exercise by death.

An establishment founded by the efforts of some philanthropic ladies of New York, on the plan of the Creches, or Public Nurseries of Paris, has just been opened at No. 110 St. Mark's-place, on the east side of the City, where Wet Nurses of unblemished character may be obtained or may find places, and where poor mothers who go out to days work may leave their infants through their working hours, returning to nourish them when they see fit, and feel assured that they will here be wisely and tenderly cared for by intelligent and faithful nurses.

The Universalist Societies throughout the United States were invited to take up collections on the first Sunday of May to aid in erecting a Monument to the late venerable Hosea Ballou in the Cemetery at Mount Auburn, near Boston. The Society in Boston, to which Mr. B. had long ministered, was willing of itself to erect a suitable Monument, but it was thought that others might wish to contribute, with the understanding that but a moderate sum was desired. The collection in the Rev. Mr. Chapin's Church, New York, amounted to $103 77.

According to an advertisement in a Concord, N. H., paper, Geo. W. Nesmith, Esq., of Franklin, (Old Salisbury,) is appointed a "Commissioner to allow the claims of creditors against the estate of Hon. Daniel Webster," which is decreed to be administered as an insolvent estate!

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Monday, May 8, 1854, says: The Pennsylvania Legislature to-day passed the bill relative to the sale of spirituous liquors. It prevents the sale of beer, or other malt liquors, without license, and prohibits any person from obtaining a license and selling spirituous liquors, by the quart or otherwise, unless the person so applying shall be a retailer of foreign or domestic goods, wares, and merchandize, entitled to be classed equal to class 14, and have been thus classed by mercantile appraisers. Persons violating the law to be subject to the same penalties as keepers of unlicensed tippling-houses.

The New York Methodist Conference has expelled from its communion a rum-selling member who showed no humiliation under private rebuke, and was duly tried, and by a committee unanimously cut off. So ought all churches to do with such transgressors of the great law of love. The editor of the paper announcing the fact, says—"We confess, we can make nothing of rum-sellers, or habitual rum-drinkers either, and must therefore get rid of them."

A dispatch dated Erie, Pa., Monday, May 8, 1854, says: Yesterday, during the morning service at the Catholic church in this city, the gallery, which was crowded on account of the presence of the Bishop, gave way, precipitating the occupants on the crowd below. One man was taken out dead, and many others badly injured, three of whom are not expected to recover.

The Detroit (Mich.) Advertiser, May 10, says Hon. James G. Birney, of Lower Saginaw, we were pleased to welcome back again to his home on Saturday last. He, with his lady, has been spending the winter in Philadelphia, and return, we believe, in very good health and spirits. They will be warmly welcomed by their neighbors, by whom they are justly held in high esteem.

Charles Irving, of the Lynchburg (Va.) Republican, has challenged the Hon. Philip S. White, the great Temperance lecturer, to fight a duel, in consequence of some remarks which Mr. White had made in a public address in that city. Mr. W. replied, that he was under engagements until the 10th of June, but should be happy to meet Mr. Irving on the 12th of June at the United States Hotel in Philadelphia.

A letter from Weaversville, Fauquier county, Va., states that the recent cold weather proved very fatal to the cattle, sheep, and lambs of that neighborhood. One farmer lost thirty-five sheep, other farmers, eight, ten, and twelve cattle. It is conjectured that these losses were occasioned by the animals being suddenly chilled.

There will be a grand exhibition of horses on the Washington Trotting Park, Providence, R. I., on the 21st and 22d of June. The Society for the Encouragement of Domestic Industry offer premiums to the amount of $650.

The Legislature of Massachusetts, at its recent session, passed resolutions appropriating $20,000 for the establishment of a State Reform School for girls, provided that an equal amount shall be raised by individual donation.

The trial of Mrs. Hayes in New York for the murder of Dr. Lutener was concluded by a verdict of acquittal, the Jury declaring that though they believe the deceased was murdered, there was no evidence to fix the guilt upon Mrs. Hayes.

The New Orleans Board of Aldermen have passed a resolution authorizing the payment of $100,000 to Messrs. Roselius, Hunt, Gehiele, and Preaux, the gentlemen who conducted the McDonough will case on behalf of the city.

The sales of real estate at the Exchange in New York since the first of January, four months, have amounted to $6,000,000, or $4,000,000 more than for the four months next preceding.

The Frankfurter Journal informs us that the Sultan, in consideration of a loan from the house of Rothschild, has made over to them Palestine, and the revenues derivable therefrom, as security.

Rev. William Dean, DD., a returned Missionary from China, was married on the 9th inst., to Mrs, Brown, who went to Siam some years since, as the wife of the lamented Slafter.

Mary Howitt is engaged in writing a popular history of America, intended to made the reading class of English artisans, &c., better acquainted with the history of the United States than they have hitherto been.

In Norristown, Pa., recently, a woman named Maria Daley killed her infant, six weeks old, by cutting its head from its body with a razor. The woman was of intemperate habits. She is in prison, awaiting trial.

The United States Mail steamship Illinois sailed from Old Point Comfort a few days ago, having on board the U. S. troops landed at Norfolk by the Falcon, which put in in distress.

The Caloric Ship Ericsson has been raised and brought to her dock. It is said that her machinery has suffered no serious injury, but it will take a month or two to put her in order again.

On Sabbath morning, May 13th, a sad accident occurred on the Troy and Greenbush Railroad, a short distance south of the village of Bath, by which several persons, including four ladies, were badly injured.

Mr. J. R. Speed, an enterprising and valuable citizen of Tompkins County, and recently President of their Agricultural Society, was killed, a few days since, by lightning.

The New York and New Haven Railroad has already paid $250,000 on account of the Norwalk accident, and will probably have to pay $50,000 more.

The steamer Washington arrived at New York last week from Bremen, having on board 447 persons taken from the ship Winchester, abandoned at sea.

The Editors of Illinois, in a State Convention, Simeon Francis presiding, drafted a Memorial to Congress against increasing the rates of newspaper or letter postage.

About one hundred persons applied for passage in the Pacific, which sailed last week for Europe who could not be accommodated for the want of room.

The next State Fair of the Wisconsin Agricultural Society will be held at Milwaukee the first week in October.

John Henry Harris, a colored man, has recovered a verdict of $50 damages against the select men of Boxboro', Mass., for refusing to allow him to vote in the year 1852.

The Free Church Society in Cazenovia has invited the Rev. Antoinette L. Brown to become their pastor. She has not, however, signified her acceptance.

On the 8th inst., by Eld. H. Cornwell, Mr. NATHAN EMERSON, of Welling, to Miss HELEN LYON, of Alfred.

At Alfred, N. Y., May 11, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. RICHARD G. JONES to Miss ELECTA MATILDA COOK, all of Alfred.

DIED,

In Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 27th ult., Mrs. MARY ANN VARS, wife of John Vars, and daughter of Henry R Remington, Esq., of Washington, Coventry, R. I., aged 33 years.

At Marlboro, N. J., May 6th, of inflammation of the lungs, Mrs. RACHEL M., wife of Dea. Alexander C. Heritage, in the 41st year of her age. Her painful and protracted illness was borne with Christian patience and resignation. Sister H. professed religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at New Market, but after her marriage with Dea. Heritage, she became a member at Marlboro, and continued to adorn her profession until her death. She was respected and beloved in life, and has left a large circle of friends, relatives, and Christian acquaintance, to mourn their loss, consoled with the thought that she rests from her labors, and her works do follow her. On the afternoon of the 7th, a large number of persons assembled at the dwelling of her husband to take their leave of the remains of one they loved, and were addressed from the 7th verse of the 116th Psalm. On the morning of the 8th, a number of the friends accompanied the body by public conveyance to New Brunswick, and thence to New Market. The funeral took place on the 9th at the New Market Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house; sermon by Eld. D. Clawson, from 1st Cor. 15: 51—"Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." The exercises were attended by a large concourse of people, friends and mourners. D. Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order CHIMES of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes, in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintainingit in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Miscellaneous.

Thank Heaven I'm still a Boy.

They smile at me—they laughing say,
"When will you be a man?
The parting year leaves you the boy
You were when it began."
And I in love with the disgrace,
Their smiles and jests enjoy,
And thank kind Heaven that, old in years,
In heart I'm still a boy!

What is it, this they'd have me win—
This gain from which I start?
A keener, calculating head—
Ah! loss, a colder heart!
Well, manhood's sense, or boyhood's warmth,
But leave one if I enjoy—
Leave, the heart, and keep the head;
I still will be a boy. [W. C. Bennett.

Perpetual Daylight.

The influence of the long summer day in the Arctic Regions has often been described, but seldom with more force and beauty than in the following passages of Dr. Kane's description of the late American Expedition to the Arctic Regions :—

"The perpetual daylight had continued up to this moment with unabated glare. The sun had reached his north meridian altitude some days before, but the eye was hardly aware of the change. Midnight had a softened character, like the low summer's sun at home, but there was no twilight.

"At first the novelty of this great unvarying day made it pleasing. It was curious to see the 'midnight Arctic sun set into sunrise,' and pleasant to find that, whether you ate or slept, or idled or toiled, the same daylight was always there. No irksome night forced upon you its system of compulsory alternations. I could dine at midnight, sup at breakfast time, and go to bed at noonday; and but for an apparatus of coils and cogs, called a watch, would have been no wiser and no worse.

"My feeling was at first an extravagant sense of undefined relief, of some vague restraint removed. I seemed to have thrown off the slavery of hours. In fact, I could hardly realize its entirety. The astral lamps, standing, dust covered, on our lockers—I am quoting the words of my journal—puzzled me, as things obsolete and fanciful.

"This was instinctive, perhaps; but by-and-by came other feelings. The perpetual light, garish and unfluctuating, disturbed me. I became gradually aware of an unknown excitant, a stimulus, acting constantly like the diminutive of a cup of strong coffee. My sleep was curtailed and irregular; my meal hours trod upon each other's heels; and but for stringent regulations of my own imposing, my routine would have been completely broken up.

"My lot had been cast in the zone of liriodendrons and sugar maples, in the nearly midway of latitude 40 degrees. I had been habituated to day and night; and every portion of these two great divisions had for me its periods of peculiar association. Even in the tropics, I had mourned the lost twilight. How much more did I miss the soothing darkness, of which twilight should have been the precursor! I began to feel, with more of emotion than a man writing for others likes to confess to, how admirable, as a systematic law, is the alternation of day and night—words that type the two great conditions of living nature, action and repose. To those who with daily labor earn their daily bread, how kindly the season of sleep! To the drone who, urged by the waning daylight, hastens the deferred task, how fortunate that his procrastination has not a sixth months' morrow! To the brain workers among men, the enthusiasts, who bear irksomely the dark screen which falls upon their day dreams, how benignant the dear night blessing, which enforces reluctant rest!"

Management of the Locust Tree.

From the Ohio Farmer.

The Locust, Robinia pusedo-acacia, is a native of the United States.

Method of Cultivation.—"It is capable of being raised from the seed, cuttings, layings, and suckers; but the seed method is said to afford the best plants. The seeds should be sown about the end of March, or beginning of the following month, on a bed of light mould, being covered to the depth of about half an inch. The plants usually appear in the course of six or eight weeks. They should be well weeded and watered, and, when sufficiently strong, should be set out in the spring, or autumn, in nursery rows for two or three years, in order to remain to have a proper growth for final planting." [Rees' Cyclopedia.

Dr. Drown, of Rhode Island, says that "the easiest method of raising the locust is as follows: Plant fifteen or twenty trees on an acre, and, when fifteen or twenty feet high, run straggling furrows through the ground, and, wherever the roots are cut with the plough, new trees will start up, and will soon stock the ground with a plentiful growth."

Use.—It is observed in the North American Sylva, a celebrated work, by F. Andrew Michaux, that "The greatest consumption of locust-wood is for posts, which are employed in preference for the inclosing of court-yards, gardens, and farms, in the district where the tree abounds, and the circumjacent country. They are transported for the same use to Lancaster, Baltimore, Washington, Alexandria, and the vicinity. When the trees are felled in the winter, while the circulation of sap is suspended, and these posts are allowed to become perfectly dry before they are set, they are estimated to last forty years. Experience has shown that their duration varies according to certain differences in the trees from which they are formed; thus about Lancaster, and at Harrisburg, a small town on the Susquehannah, where a considerable trade is carried on in wood that is brought down the river, those trees are reputed the best whose heart is red; those next in esteem are those with a greenish-yellow heart; and the least valuable are those with a white heart. From this variety in the color of wood, which probably arises from a difference of soil, are derived the names of red, green, and white locust. In the Western States there is a variety which is sometimes called the black locust."

It is probable that the locust with a "greenish-yellow heart," spoken of by M. Michaux, is the same with that which Mr. Briggs calls the yellow locust; and although M. Michaux supposes "this variety in the color of the wood probably arises from a difference of soil," it is not impossible that there may be permanent specific differences in the several varieties. If so, the discovery is of importance.

M. Michaux says, "In naval architecture, the shipwrights use as much locust-wood as they can procure. It is as durable as the live oak and the red cedar, with the advantage of being stronger than the one, and lighter than the other."

With regard to the insect which destroys the locust, M. Michaux says, "Within eighteen or twenty years, an obstacle has unhappily appeared which will contribute greatly to prevent the multiplication of the locust in all the anciently-settled parts of the United States; this is a winged insect, which attacks the trees while standing, penetrates through the bark in the center of the trunk, and, for the space of a foot, mines it in every direction, so that it is easily broken by the wind. This inconvenience is already so serious as to induce many people to forego all attempts to form plantations of locust. In Virginia, I have not learned that trees of the natural growth have been visited by this destroyer, but those that have been reared about the plantations have already felt its ravages. This evil, which is hard to remedy, will be more sensibly felt when the destruction of the forests now on foot—an inevitable consequence of the neglect of all measures of preservation—shall force the inhabitants to have recourse to plantations which they will wish to form, in a certain proportion, of the locust. Hence it may result that, disappearing from the American forests, by constant consumption, and not being reproduced on account of the insect, the locusts will become extremely rare in their native country; and abundant in Europe, where no similar catastrophe forbids their propagation."

The Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Agriculture have offered a premium of fifty dollars "for a mode of extirpating the worm that attacks the locust tree, which shall appear to the satisfaction of the trustees to be effectual."

End of the Great Fraud Case.

The Washington Globe of May 2d, says: Yesterday being the day fixed for the trial of John Charles Gardiner, for perjury, charged to have been committed by him as a witness in the first trial of his brother, the late George A. Gardiner, the defendant was called, but did not appear; his recognizance was therefore forfeited. The recognizance in the case of the indictment for false swearing, charged to have been committed in his affidavit presented to the Board of Commissioners in support of his brother's claim, was also forfeited. Dr. Thomas Miller was the surety in the sum of $8,000 for the appearance of Gardiner to answer the charge of perjury, and Hudson Taylor and James McClery were his sureties in the sum of $4,000 to appear to answer the charge of false swearing. We learn from a reliable source that Messrs. Miller, Taylor, and McClery will suffer no loss, being amply indemnified. This is probably the end of one of the most remarkable cases to be found in the criminal annals of the country. The facts are familiar to our readers, and indeed to nearly the entire people of the United States. An enormous fraud supported by perjury, was practiced upon the Government, and an amount exceeding $400,000 was drawn from the Treasury. The principal in this nefarious transaction was convicted, and one hour after the verdict of the jury was rendered, he committed suicide by taking poison. His brother, yesterday, forfeited his recognizance, and it is reported, and believed, that he left the city two weeks since for some place beyond the United States. The two Gardiners were prosecuted by Phillip Richard Fendall, Esq., late District-Attorney of the United States, and by the Hon. Henry May, of the House of Representatives, with the ability, zeal, and firmness for which they are distinguished. About $80,000 of the money improperly obtained from the Treasury by Geo. A. Gardiner, was some time since attached in the hands of Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs, and will, in due time, be returned to the Treasury. The probability is, that the history of the Gardiner claim, and a report of the trial which resulted in his conviction, will, at no very distant day, be published; and it will be found to be the most imposing and remarkable case to be found in the criminal authorities of this or any other country.

A Turkish Joan D'Arc.

A Paris correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette narrates the following story of a practically Woman's Rights companion:—

A curious story is told at this moment of a second Joan of Arc who has appeared in the Turkish Army. A girl named named Gara, a descendant of Solomon Pacha, former Governor of Morach, in Asia, arrived lately at Adana, on her way to Constantinople. She marched at the head of a corps of irregular cavalry; many persons tried to persuade her to abandon the strange enterprise; but nothing shook her courage or her resolution to combat the enemies of her country. Some persons thought to intimidate her by saying that if she remained in the army, she must give a trial of her skill by assault at arms. The Governor of Adana, who was informed of the fact, ordered that the young girl should be brought before him, and he asked her if she still persisted in her resolution. She responded in the affirmative, and added that she would engage willingly in the trial at arms to which they had said she must submit, provided they would give her for an adversary the bravest and most vigorous of the 2,000 cavaliers of which the detachment was composed. The combat took place immediately, and after a contest of some minutes, the cavalier chosen for her adversary was disarmed by the young girl, and declared vanquished. The Governor then ordered that she should then be regularly enrolled, and counted her down 1500 piastres, ($85,) and gave the rank of officer to her brother who served in an inferior grade.

Culture of Melons, &c.

With judicious culture, melons of excellent quality may be produced in abundance. Those who wish to be in season, should lose no time now in preparing the ground for it. For each hill, dig a hole two feet deep and three feet wide, and fill one foot of the bottom with rich manure; then fill to the natural surface with fine compost of rich earth and mould. In this, when the weather is warm enough to insure quick germination, plant your seeds at equal distances apart. If the weather should be very dry, the hills should be watered once a day, with water that has been exposed to the air long enough to attain an equal temperature with the atmosphere; or better still, set a tall and narrow box on the center of this hill, and fill it with horse-stable manure; once in a day or two, at night, pour in a few quarts of water, and let it leach through the manure. When the plants show themselves above ground, defend them by a box covered with millinet, to keep off the bugs, which will also serve to ward off cold winds. When the plants are well established, select a few of the best, and pull up the others. Keep the plants free from weeds.

Cucumbers may be treated in the same way.

"Our Own Correspondent."

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times gives the following picture of the comforts and dignity of the "own correspondent" of the London Times:—

"Next to the berth of British Ambassador at Paris, I suppose that the post of correspondent to the London Times is most to be desired. Let me rehearse a few of the immunities and privileges of that individual. His salary is $5,000 a year. He has a handsome suite of rooms, furnished and paid for by the paper. He has two clerks constantly in his employ, who read the French journals, translate, collate, cut out items from Galignani, and add their eyes, invention, experience and observation to his. These gentlemen are paid by the Times, of course. The correspondent buys and charges to the paper any books of which he may stand in need—and the library is a very choice and complete collection of standard authors, cyclopedias, dictionaries, and other books of reference. He is empowered to pay for any important intelligence, just what it may cost.

"When the Post-office closes early, to the infinite annoyance of all us correspondents of low degree, he writes on merrily till sunset, and then hires a man to jump into the 7 o'clock train and take his letter to London! The Times pays the bill. Besides all this, his position is such that a great many things come to him, without his giving himself the trouble to go to them. Thus, a proclamation of Henry V. desires to see the light, M. Berryer sends it to the correspondent of the London Times, who gives it to one of his clerks to translate. All the other correspondents, when they see it in print, throw up their hands, and wonder how the man knew there was such a proclamation in existence, and where he went to get it. In short, it is a great thing to represent the London Times in Paris. To be able to say you are the Russian Ambassador, is one thing; to be forced to confess you are the Envoy from Venezuela, is another. To stand up and say you are the correspondent of the Times, is to locate yourself between the two, and rather nearer the top than the foot of the column."

Curiosities of the Patent Office—Agricultural Implements.

During the last year, 144 patents were granted for agricultural implements, twenty-seven of which were for harvesters, power-reapers, mowers, &c. The following abstract of this interesting department of invention, as exhibited in the Patent Report, is given in the Scientific American:—

"Three patents were granted for horse-power potatoe-digging machines; the models of two of these we have seen, but have not yet had the pleasure of seeing a large one in operation. Fifteen patents were granted for improvements in ploughs, and four for cultivators. No less than twenty-six were granted for seed-planters. This number is very large, considering that such machines are of no recent origin; it shows the importance of this class of machines, and the dissatisfaction entertained with those already in use. The devices patented, however, were mostly confined to the mode of distributing the seed; the novelties patented are said to be small, but that of B. D. Sanders, of Holiday's Cove, Va., for operating the shove-rod to work the valves by friction-rollers and rotary-cam, is a very good one. Three patents were granted for horse-rakes, and threshers and separators; one of the latter consisted in having an inclined, rotary, cylindrical straw-carrier, supported on friction-rollers. This cylinder is full of holes, and as the straw is carried, the grain falls down through the openings. Ten patents were granted for hullers and smut-machines—one of them being for washing and scrubbing, and drying the grain. One patent was granted for a weigher combined with a winnower. The weighing apparatus is secured in such a manner to the machine, that when the measure is filled up to the proper weight, the balance tips the weighed grain, which is thrown upon inclined ways, and immediately starts off on a railroad track to the grain-depot. Four patents were granted for corn-shellers; in one the ears are allowed to accumulate, to act in the mass as an elastic bed against the spiral shelling projections. Three patents were granted for straw-cutters, and nine for miscellaneous agricultural implements, one of them being for a metallic tube scythe-snath."

The Cranberry.

It has frequently been asked, What is the most successful method of cultivating the cranberry? This may perhaps be a somewhat difficult question to answer, as it has been grown "successfully" in a great variety of ways, and on almost every description of soil, intervening between dry and dusty sands, and those composed of viscid and tenacious clay. It is indigenous to low, boggy lands, and consequently to such its cultivation has, till recently, been almost exclusively confined. When grown on such lands, the plants are generally "set" in the fall. The bog land requires no preparation, except a covering of sand about two inches deep. The vines are removed from their original position, with a small quantity of soil attached to their roots, and transplanted two or three feet apart. They develop foliage rapidly, and require hoeing only during the first two years after being set out. When circumstances admit of it, it is a good plan to keep the water on them from December till about the first or second week in April, and after that to keep it, if possible, level with the ground's surface, so as to retain a supply of moisture about the roots, during the first part of the season. Early frost, or frost in the autumn, before the fruit begins to ripen, proves fatal to the crop. Cranberries are obtained from vines thus managed, the second or third year, and the plants, when once established, never run out.

A writer in the Massachusetts Plowman gives an experiment in transplanting cranberries from low, swampy land, into good corn land, "in hills far enough apart to admit the cultivator, and clean hoeing." The work of transplanting was performed early in the spring; at midsummer they blossomed, and in the fall produced fine fruit. The berries were large, very handsome, and many of the hills produced a pint of fruit."

In 1846, the Cultivator contained an interesting article on cranberry culture, in which it was asserted that Mr. Sullivan Bates, of Bellingham, Mass., had raised this fruit in great abundance, "by transplanting the vines from low ground to high." The system this gentleman pursues is, it seems, to plant them in lines, or drills, twenty inches apart, (whether vines or seeds, it is not stated,) and seven inches in the drill. His plan is always successful. He has raised from a single acre in one season, cranberries to the amount of four hundred bushels! It is essential, however, to the success of this plant, that the soil be such as will not parch or bake, and should be replete with energetic humus in a state of slow but uniform decomposition and decay.

It is also asserted in the Farmer's Dictionary, that the cranberry is a plant easily and successfully cultivated on uplands, and that the powers of prolification, and the general health and physiological character of the production, appear to be ameliorated and greatly improved by changing its medium, and also that the product is more desirable, being a fairer development, and superior flavor. "The runners," says this authority, "can be 'layered,' or seed sown in the spring. They grow rapidly, covering nearly every thing, and are but little subject to the attacks of insects. The plants are set about eight inches apart, and are kept clean at first. The yield increases for several years, and becomes as great as four hundred bushels per acre, in five years, although two hundred is a good average. The fruit is gathered with rakes, which serve to prune the plants at the same time. When the berries are intended for keeping, they should be rolled over a gently inclined plane of wood, in order to remove such as are soft or rotten. They keep well for a year in tight casks, filled with water, and headed close.

It is stated in the American Agriculturist, that Mr. William Hall, of Norway, Maine, "sowed the berries on the snow, in spring, on a boggy piece of land, about three rods square. The seed took well, rooted out the weeds, and produced accordingly." It is greatly to be hoped that the cultivation of this plant, now ascertained by so little trouble and expense, will become more common.

Sweet Potatoes.

We are rather late for the following directions, but in some situations it may still be seasonable, and it will do for all another year:

In the spring, as soon as all danger from frost is past, the hot-bed for sprouting the potatoes should be made, by boarding off the space intended therefor in a warm situation, and filling it to the height of two or three feet with manure from the horse-stable, and upon this a layer of three or four inches of fine chip-dirt must be placed, upon which the potatoes may be laid as closely as possible, and covered about two inches in depth with the same material, or with any fine rich earth. If the weather should prove very dry, an occasional watering with tepid water, or warm soap-suds, would be beneficial, or, if the nights should be cold and frosty, the hot-bed should be protected by covering it with any material most convenient. When the sprouts are sufficiently large to warrant good roots, they may be pulled from the potatoes and planted in ridges previously prepared.

The ridges are mostly made by throwing two furrows apart with the plough, and applying some well-rotted manure, then covering the same by returning the earth, thus forming a ridge of the height of ten or twelve inches, in which sets are to be planted six or eight inches asunder. The best time to plant them is immediately before or after a rain, or. during a spell of damp weather, or even in the cool of the evening, if watered occasionally until fairly established.

The ground must then be kept mellow and free from weeds until the vines prevent further culture. When the vines are killed by frost, the potatoes should be taken up, and after remaining in the shade a short time to dry, those not intended for immediate use may be packed away in dry sand or earth in barrels or boxes, by first placing a layer of sand and then one of potatoes, until the vessel is filled. Upon the approach of cold weather, they should be placed in a situation secure from frost. In this manner they have frequently been kept till May or June. In packing them away, all potatoes that have been injured in taking up should be laid aside for present use. A soil moderately fertile and somewhat sandy, with a southern aspect, is mostly preferred for the sweet potatoe.

To Kill Crows.

In the winter, or towards spring, the crows are generally very plentiful. Take the entrails of hogs or sheep, or a dead carcass of any kind, and place it at a proper distance behind the barn, or other out-buildings; then take a two-inch augur and bore a hole through some convenient spot, the proper height, and remain inside after they frequent it. Then take a good fowling-piece, well loaded, and when the crows assemble to dine, point the muzzle of your gun through the port-hole, take a dead level at the thickest part of the assembly, and let go, and the carnage will be desperate. This is no theory; it is practical experience. I think nothing of killing twenty at four shots with a small gun. I have often done it, and had crows in the spring by the bushel. If you want scare crows, take out the insides, and throw in a handful of salt to preserve them, and you can have crows to hang over the fields in the spring in any quantity; and, depend upon it, they are perfectly horrified at the sight, and have no idea of entering premises where their black brethren are so uncivilly dealt with.

Orchards worth Improving.

The present high prices of fruit remind farmers that good orchards are profitable, even in a barren season like the past, and may induce the inquiry with many, How shall I manage my orchard, which produces but a scanty crop of inferior fruit, to make it more profitable?

That there is cause for barrenness is evident, and in order to apply a remedy, it is first necessary to ascertain where the trouble is. Perhaps the first inquiry may properly be, were the trees when planted in good condition and well set? or were they of second or third quality, and fifty or more planted in a day, when the same labor could have been profitably expended upon five? If the error should be traced to either of these causes, an effectual remedy may be sought for in vain. I will cite an example within my knowledge of one who ploughed a few furrows for the roots of his trees, and then ploughed the dirt on to cover them, a quick way to plant trees, but the result was as might be expected; a small part lived a few years, but I think all died.

Another labored hard to plant five trees, but when done were worth more than one hundred crowded into small holes, as too many are.

But if the trees have become exhausted, as too many have, in the same way a corn field would, planted many years in succession without manure, much may be done towards restoring it, not to that degree of tilth of N. P. Norton's, (whose entire farm consists of eight acres, and whose fruit crop the past season amounted to $850,) yet with a liberal dressing, judicious pruning, scraping and washing the trees, &c., much of its decayed vigor may be restored, which would be largely repaid in the quality and quantity of fruit, besides affording its owner the pleasure of seeing his trees in a comparatively healthy condition, rather than dying by inches from starvation.

TREATMENT FOR HYDROPHOBIA.—A writer in the Worcester Transcript, who professes to have had successful experience in treating persons bitten by rabid dogs, recommends the following treatment immediately on a bite being received:—

"First—enlarge the wound with some sharp cutting instrument, if punctured, taking care completely to sever the nerve or nerves injured. Second—after washing the wound, apply either nitrate of silver, nitric acid, muriatic acid, or spirits of ammonia taking care that all the wounded parts are touched. In extremely nervous cases we would recommend muriatic acid, or ammonia, if they can as easily be obtained. This done, apply a poultice of bread and milk and poppy leaves, for one or two days, long enough to keep the parts warm and moist, and wash the wound in a strong tea of sumach bark and lobelia herb—healing with a poultice of slippery elm wet up with the above tea. Attention should be paid to the condition of the pores, and they should be kept free, and all exposure to colds avoided. Lobelia in small doses, alone or combined, forms one of the best internal remedies for this purpose, and should almost invariably be used."

QUILTING-FRAMES.—Somebody has invented a new and more convenient quilting-frame, which is described in one of our exchanges as follows:—

Frame four legs together, like the frame of a kitchen table, with side pieces 9 feet long, dropped 5 inches below the top of the legs, and end pieces 2½ feet long. Now take some scantling 2 or 2½ inches square and round them, with inch round tenons upon each end, to work in sockets in the top of the legs. Upon one end of each of these rollers have a little rachet wheel and catch, and nail a strip of cloth along one side of each, to which to tack the edges of the quilt. When all ready, roll it all but the 2½ feet wide strip upon one roller and tighten the catch; now quilt that and roll upon the other roller and so on till finished. The side pieces should be made to go in with a key, so that the frame can be taken down and packed away at any time, even with the quilt half finished, as it can be rolled up snug. It is a simple piece of domestic machinery, but would add to the comfort of many a household.

A PRAIRIE PECULIARITY.—A correspondent of the New York Post states that the consumption of wood upon the prairies in cold weather in the locomotives is much greater than among the settlements or in the timbered country, and the amount of steam produced much less. A train will leave Detroit with from twenty-five to thirty-five freight cars, and from eighty to one hundred pounds of steam. As it nears Chicago, on the open prairie, the steam will fall gradually to thirty-five or forty-five pounds; and the engine, leaving half its train, runs with the remainder to Chicago. So, put an iron box stove on the top of one of the cars on the pairie, let the fire burn intensely, and the surface of the stove will not burn the hand laid upon it. It is a problem, the solution of which would make the fortune of an inventor, how this very rapid loss of heat can be prevented.

THE LENGTH OF DAYS.—At Berlin and London, the longest day has sixteen and a half hours. At Stockholm and Upsale, the longest day has eighteen and a half hours. At Hamburg, Dantzi and Stettin, the longest day has seventeen hours, and the shortest seven. At St. Petersburg and Tobolsk, the longest has nineteen, and the shortest five hours. At Tornea, in Finland, the longest day has twenty-one hours and a half, and the shortest two and a half. At Wanderbut, in Norway, the day lasts from the 21st of May to the 22d of July, without interruption; and at Spitzbergen, the longest three and a half months.

A TARTAR INN.—When a traveler arrives at a Tartar inn, and mentions what he wishes to eat, the controller of the table sings them in a kind of chant to the governor of the pot. Before commencing his supper, the traveler invites everybody present to partake of the feast: "Come and take a glass of wine with me! Come and eat a plate of rice with me!" says he. Each one excuses himself, and says, "No, thank you!" and so the matter ends. When the traveler prepares to leave, the controller again chants the names of the dishes, but this time he is careful to mention the price of each.

Mr. John Toothaker, who is engaged in extensive lumbering operations about the upper waters of the Umbagog lakes, writes to the Farmington Chronicle that one of his men, who was felling a pine tree near the Mooselamaguntic, struck a hard substance which rendered his axe comparatively useless. On examination it proved to be a stone, which, when taken out, weighed thirty-three pounds. The stone was four feet from the ground, in the center of the tree—the tree was perfectly smooth, and over two feet in diameter at the place where the stone was imbedded.

Mr. Barnes, formerly editor of the London Times, said to Thomas Moore, that the great deficiency he found among his writers, was not talent, but common sense. Not one of them, he said, can be trusted to write often or long on the same subject, as they were sure to get bewildered with it; and he includes himself in this remark.

There is no policy like politeness; and a good manner is the best thing in the world either to get a good name, or to supply the want of it.

BUDHISM.

An Essay read by Rev. Mr. Culbertson at a missionary inquiry meeting held in Shanghae, China, on the last Second-day evening in November, 1853. Communicated for the Sabbath Recorder by Nathan Wardner.

The worshipers of Budha are the inhabitants of Siam, Ceylon, Japan, Cochin-China, and the greater part of China Proper. Budha has more than 180,000,000 of worshipers. This religion originated about 543 years before Christ. Budha Gaudama was of royal descent, and embraced the life of an ascetic. Owing to the universal disposition of superstitious nations to reverence men of great external austerity, he became the leader of his sect, and after his death was worshiped as a god. He was the son, probably, of a king of the city of Benares on the Ganges. It would seem that some time in the course of his life, he conferred great benefits upon the island of Ceylon. It is a current opinion among the learned Burmans, that Gaudama was not worshiped until 450 years after his death. It is a question not yet settled, whether Gaudama was the founder of a new sect, or whether he embraced a religion already prevalent. The want of credible historical records renders it difficult to determine whether Bramanism or Budhism was the original religion of India. But during eleven successive reigns—a period of 291 years—the kings were of the Budhist faith. At the end of this period the reigning monarch was assassinated, and the throne usurped by an adherent of Braminical superstition; and of course the scales turned, and the Budhists were obliged to take refuge from the rage of their enemies among the surrounding nations, and thus propagated their religion where it is now found. This persecution continued about 183 years.

The Budhists, like the Bramins, have chosen for their hero ten incarnations. In one of his incarnations, many ages before he attained to the state of Budha, he was born with an inheritance of vast riches, which his ancestors had been amassing for several generations. All these he dispensed to the poor, and betook himself to the monastic life in the forest, in a place prepared for him by the god Sakkria. He was there invested with the priesthood, and in the course of seven days was endowed with the power of flying in the air. One day, while flying above the city Ramawattu Nuwara, he understood that the then reigning Budha was to pass that way. He descended from the air and extended himself upon the road, with his head towards the Budha. When the Budha arrived at the place, the superstition came upon him, and he prophesied that after innumerable years the prostrated pilgrim would become a Budha like himself. In the close of that life the pilgrim was born in the heaven called Loosita, which is the fifth heaven. While there, all the gods in that heaven came to him in a body, and besought him to come into the world of men and accept of the dynasty of Budha. Gaudama, overcome by their importunity, consented, and chose for his mother the wife of king Suddadama of the city of Bonares, and after ten months was born. The Chinese assert that he was born. Immediately after his birth, he walked forward seven steps toward the North, and said in a tone that was heard through 10,000 worlds, "I will be the highest, I will be the chief and superior over all worlds." The world then experienced thirty-two unprecedented acts of bounty. The blind obtained sight, the deaf recovered their hearing, the fire of hell experienced a momentary extinguishment, the brutes banished their dread, the horses neighed, the elephants yawled, the lions roared, and all the rest of the quadrupeds made a melodious howling, &c.

When 34 years of age, he attained to the state of Budha. Soon after this, finding that Ceylon, where he foresaw that his religion would flourish, was the abode of none but devils and hobgoblins, he resolved to cast them out, and render the island a fit habitation for men. He found the devils so thick that there was not the least room between them. When he ordered them to make room for him to sit down, they complained that they were already too much crowded, and refused to obey him. He immediately caused fire to flash from his body in all directions. The devils were by this so much frightened that they scampered off in the utmost dismay, and finding no refuge from the piercing of the flames in the crevices of the rocks, cast themselves headlong into the sea. Budha was then moved with compassion, and to save them from utter destruction caused an island to spring up on which he allowed them to dwell. After this he repaired to the world of snakes, which lies below the world of men, and was there entertained at a royal banquet by his royal snakeship Mahodana, the king of the snakes. He there preached a sermon by which 12,000 snakes were converted to his religion. After his return to the world of men, he impressed the print of his foot upon a rock on the top of Adam's Peak, where it is still to be seen, and is held in the highest veneration by his worshipers. When the Papists arrived at Ceylon, they seemed to have adopted this relic of Budha as their own, and ascribed it to Adam. From this, the mountain takes its name. It stands in the centre of the island, and is visible from every part of it. When Budha saw his end approaching, 45 years after he obtained the happiness of Budhahood, he called the god Sakkria, and directed him to take Ceylon under his protection. Sakkria afterwards gave the island in charge to his assistant god Wisner Nerwana. He had edified the gods with his sermons, and saved a countless multitude of men. The good works of Budha are declared to have been "as great as the ground of the world is large, the sea is deep, the heaven is high, or the air is full." He was guiltless of slaying any thing which had life, of theft, fornication, lying, speaking indecent words, eating at night, dancing, smelling flowers, &c.

There have been in all 22 Budhas; five are to live in this culpa, that is, during the continuance of the present mundane system. Four of these have already appeared, and the fifth is now in the heaven called Toosita, and will make his appearance in due time. Budha has now been dead 2,382 years, and as his religion, according to his own prediction, was to continue 5,000 years, it will come to an end in 2,618 years, or A. D. 4,458. The other Budha will then appear on earth. It is the devout prayer of every Budhist, that he may be born, when he dies, in the heaven where this Budha now is, to be born again on the earth at the same time that he makes his appearance among men.

The doctrine he taught his followers was:

I. The being of God (or god.) One of the charges brought against the Budhists by the Bramins, is, that they are Atheists. This charge is true; for they deny that there is any Most High, and Sole Supreme Being. The Bramins acknowledge, theoretically, one supreme God, omniscient and omnipresent; but they have no idea of his performing any act of creation or of providence, except by the instrumentality of inferior gods. He is in fact completely hidden behind an array of 330,000,000 of inferior deities. The Budhists say that the number of the gods is infinite, or at least countless. The number of those whose names are known is 120,535. Although they acknowledge no First Cause, they say that one god, Maha Brama, is superior to all other beings except Budha. It is this god who has the government of the world. He inhabits the sixteenth heaven, is 50 miles high, and exhibits the four virtues, viz., munificence, meekness, affability, and kindness. He is blessed with an age of 84,000 years. This world, world of men, is under the more immediate superintendence of Sakkria. He in his turn commits the care of it to four inferior gods, whose duty it is to act as body guard to their superior god, and each of them to superintend one of the four quarters of the world. The first, Dirtheraacture, resides in the East. He, and every thing connected with him, clothing, horses, servants, &c., are white. The second, Veruddhi, superintends the South. His color is sky-blue. The third, Vesvislaeskani, governs the West. His favorite color is red. The fourth, Wayrewenne, governs the North. He rejoices in the color of gold. He, in addition to his other duties, has the charge of the devils. At or near the new moon, these four gods send out their emmissaries to pass through their respective provinces and take account of the actions of men. The first eight days they devote to making out a list of sins committed. The next eight, they go about in order to revise the account and correct errors. After this, they make out a consolidated report to Sakkria, who receives it in council with 32 other gods, superior to these four. If the number of virtuous men is greater than that of the wicked, there is great joy in heaven. If the reverse, there is much sorrow.

II. Cosmogony. The Budhists believe that matter is eternal, and that every portion of animated existence has in itself its own rise, tendency, and destiny. Everything that has been created must be ascribed to Nature. The world sprung into being by chance. For want of a complete copy of the Singalese Scriptures, it cannot now be exactly determined how long it is since this event took place. This world, or rather, this system of worlds, is only one of an infinite series, which in succession have occupied and will occupy the same position in space. When the time arrives which is fixed by Nature, each world is destroyed; and after the lapse of a period exactly equal to that during which the world existed, another world, similar to the former, springs up in its place. This intervening period is a blank. These destructions comprehend not this world only, but all the rest of the universe except the nine superior heavens. Thus each world is followed by its successor, just as the leaves which fall in autumn are replaced by others in the spring. The period of the world's existence is called a Culpa. To give some idea of the duration of a culpa, they say that if a man were to walk up a mountain nine miles high once in every 100 years, and continue the process until the mountain were worn down to a plane, the time required to effect this would be nothing to the fourth part of a culpa. The world, previous to this, perished by wind, fire, and water; but this hill, being concealed beneath the abyss of the earth, escaped the destruction. Soon after the commencement of the present world, a general deluge took place; or, to use the words of their own books, the whole was filled up with the general rain of the world called Sam-pattckere Mahama. The water rose almost to the fifteenth heaven. Those of the gods in this heaven whose time for leaving it had arrived, seeing the lotus leaves floating upon the surface of the water, seated themselves upon them, and by this means, when the waters subsided, they reached the earth. These gods were at that time without bodily parts or passions, and reflected from themselves sufficient light without the aid of the sun or moon; they therefore lived in the greatest happiness. They were free from all pain and evil of every kind, and were delighted with their new abode. But afterward, becoming inflated with pride, and debased by indulging in all sorts of food, they were changed into human beings of both sexes. They there lived for a long time in total darkness, until at length the sun and moon were produced by Nature. At first they lived on the clay of the earth, which was then sweet, but on account of their avarice, it was rendered tasteless to punish them. They then subsisted on a kind of shrub, which also became tasteless, for the same reason. Afterward a kind of seed was given them; but as they continued to grow more and more wicked, they were at last compelled to till the ground.

III. Views of Virtue and Vice. Degraded as these deluded people are, their consciences testify that they are sinners, although their conceptions of moral good and evil are vague and distorted. They distinctly recognize a moral faculty in man, which causes a sense of pleasure in doing what is right, and of pain on doing what is wrong. But they have no conception of the depravity of our nature as consisting in a state of the heart. Virtue and vice consist almost entirely in external actions, although it is not denied that sin may be committed by indulging proud, angry, or revengeful thoughts. To the question, How did sin enter the world? they answer, "By avarice, covetousness, and anger." Falsehood was long unknown, and was introduced on the following occasion: King Chatiqua, one of the line of 707,787 kings, who reigned in Jambudwissa previous to the advent of Budha, desired to advance to the post of prime minister a Bramin who had been his school-fellow; and the only obstacle in the way of executing his purpose was, that the existing incumbent was the elder brother of this Bramin. The king surmounted this difficulty by asserting that his favorite was older than his brother. The Bramin was inaugurated into office. But no sooner had the king ratified the act, than he was swallowed up by the earth and descended into hell. Since that time falsehood has prevailed and increased in the earth.

The precepts of Budha are different for different classes of men. His principal commandments are ten:

1st. Thou shalt not kill.
2d. Thou shalt not steal.
3d. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
4th. Thou shalt not lie.
5th. Thou shalt not slander.
6th. Thou shalt not desire the death of thine enemy.
7th. Thou shalt not covet.
8th. Abhor all idle and indecent conversation.
9th. Thou shalt not betray the secrets of another.
10th. Do not err in the true faith, or think it false.

The first commandment refers to inferior animals as well as men. The five deadly sins which Budha overcame in this life are comprehended under a code of five commandments: 1st. Thou shalt not kill. 2d. Thou shalt not steal. 3d. Thou shalt not commit adultery. 4th. Thou shalt not say any manner of falsehood. 5th. Thou shalt not drink any intoxicating liquor. Those who desire greater degrees of holiness observe additional precepts; such, for example, as to smell no odoriferous flowers, wear no costly garments, eat nothing after noon, &c. A priest must observe more than 200 such precepts, and a high-priest 8,820 quadrillions, five millions, and thirty-six. A life of the highest virtue is one spent in abstinence from the deadly sins, together with renunciation of the pleasures of riches, liberal bestowment of charities to the poor, and reverence to Budha, as manifested by contributing to the support of the priests and decorating the temples. Peculiar blessings are promised to one who makes an image of Budha, or writes a sermon on his doctrine. Such an one will never be born in hell, but will be born of a respectable family, and will never be born a girl, will not be frightened by tigers, lions, &c. He will be born in heaven in due time, and with 1,000 heavenly wives will live in an unspeakably shining habitation. Happiness hereafter is to be secured by a life of piety here, and can be obtained in no other way. A man receives no reward after death except what he fully deserves. The joys of the heavenly world are wholly sensual and brutish; such as feasting the eyes on the charms of the goddesses, dancing in the beautiful and divine palaces, &c. There are twenty six heavens, which are divided into four classes. Six, called Rama Lokas, for the inferior gods; eleven Brama Lokas, for the superior gods. Five triumphing heavens, the mansions of the souls which are to serve the great catastrophe of the destruction of the universe. Eight Aroopa Lokas, heavens above all heavens, in some of which there are souls without bodies, and in others, bodies without souls, which nevertheless live. The highest state of glory is designated Nirwana; but it is a difficult problem to ascertain what this means. The statements with respect to it are contradictory. One calls it a union with the divine spirits; but as they acknowledge no Supreme Being, this opinion seems to be incorrect. A Syngalese priest, in answer to a question proposed by the governor of Ceylon, calls it "the blotting out or death of the soul forever." Dr. Buchanan says, that among the Burmans it implies "exemption from all the miseries of life, but by no means annihilation." This cannot be obtained by any except by those who have abstained from all sensual indulgence. The punishment of sin is provided for, in part, by the doctrine of metempsychosis. The souls of the wicked, at death, pass into the bodies of various inferior animals, or are again born into the world in some low and miserable condition, or else are born in hell. There is to be no resurrection of the body hereafter, nor is there any day of final judgment. Sentence is passed immediately after death, by the inferior god Wassunartiga, upon those who have done some good in their life, and for whom there is no hope that they will at some future time arrive at heaven. The flagrantly wicked descend to hell at once, without a hearing. But no case is so desperate as to be altogether without hope, even in hell. For after making sufficient expiation for their sins, they may again be born into the world as a slave or a girl, and if they lead virtuous lives, may, in the course of innumerable ages, attain to heaven, and even to the hall of glory.

There are eight chief hells, situated under the abyss of the earth, and fitted into each other like a case of pots. Each of these has 16 minor hells connected with it, so that the whole number of hells is 136. They are inclosed on all sides with walls 36 miles in thickness. Punishments are inflicted in proportion to crimes committed, with sledges, bone-breakers, pincers, spits, &c. Occasionally, the skin is taken off, and not unfrequently, melted lead is poured down the throat.

The doctrine with regard to the origin of devils is, that when the sun, moon, and stars were produced by nature, those who are now devils were human beings. On account of their horrible sins, they fell from their state of happiness. It is denied that they ever were gods or angels. Such of them as are born into the world as men, may, by leading virtuous lives, regain their former happiness. Budha has forbidden his followers to pay divine honors to devils, but as they are enemies to the human race, and have the power of bringing calamities upon men, it is thought expedient to conciliate them by paying them some honors, such as making offerings of money, boiled meat, rice, &c.

IV. Worship. While Budha was upon earth, he taught his adherents to worship and hold in equal reverence three things, viz: the relics of his body, the books containing his doctrine, and an assembly of his followers. The priests worshiped at the temples daily by repeating certain forms of prayer, and offering rice, meat, flowers, &c. There are three stated periods of prayer, daily—in the morning at half-past four or five o'clock, at noon, and at half past six in the evening. Some pray much more frequently. Feasts are observed at the new and full moons, and at the first and last quarters. On these occasions all public business is suspended, and the people repair to the temples with their offerings. Some attend colleges to hear portions of the doctrines of Budha read by the priests.

The priests are not permitted to marry. They are supported chiefly by the produce of the lands, usually attached to the temples; and where there are no such lands, they rely wholly upon charity, going about from house to house for their daily food. They do not, like common mendicants, ask for what they desire, but wait at the door till something is offered, and take whatever is given. The whole worldly estate of a priest consists of three yellow garments, a begging dish, a girdle, a razor, a needle, and a cloth to strain the water he drinks, in order that he may not be guilty of destroying life. The houses in which they reside are built for them by the more wealthy among the people as works of merit. When a slave is offered to a priest, he emancipates him or has him appointed a priest. Colleges are erected by the wealthy, in which boys are taught gratuitously by the priests. When they find a boy of bright parts, they solicit the consent of the parents to have him appointed a priest.

V. Literature. It is stated in their histories, that the early kings for many generations reigned an asankaya of years, that is, a number of years too great to be counted. In those days, it is said, there was no sin in the world, and men lived so long that they forgot their birth and their death. They did not know the infirmities of life, and were strangers to misery and sorrow. They derided even the gods themselves, who were not blessed with so great an age. Even the irrational animals, in those days, had kings. After many generations their age and beauty began to diminish, until at last the kings reigned only 60,000 years, and then 50,000, and so on.

A story is related of one of the early kings, which resembles very much the translation of Enoch. He struck his right hand upon the ground, looked towards heaven, and said, "O, ye gods, I am not satisfied with the happiness of the world of mankind; give me the happiness of the gods, if I deserve it." Upon this, the gods caused to fall a shower of gold, covering the earth to the height of the knee to the distance of 150 miles. Soon afterward he was taken up to the world of the gods, and having remained there many millions of years, he returned to the earth and reigned an asankaya of years.

Traces of the dispersion at the building of the tower of Babel appear in the story of Moochalindanam. He had 60,000 sons, who having divided the kingdom of Jambudwipa amongst themselves, reigned in separate cities. After many years their descendants forgot each other, and the royal family became extinct.

Most of the Singalese books are scattered through the island, laid up in the temples, of which there are more than three hundred. The following are a few examples: 1st. The book called Dampiyawa contains sermons of Budha to the priests and others, together with rules of life. 2d. Brama-zala-sustraza, shows how the priests are to preserve the commandments of Budha, and how to abstain from sins, also the frame of the sixty-two other religions. 3d. Manzarsey is the first book of the doctors, by which every thing about physic may be known. 4th. Brachmugali-Socha, a dialogue between a Budhist priest and a Bramin, in which the latter is at last converted. The Jutakas are regarded as the most valuable compendium of the Budhist faith, and although copies of the entire work are extremely rare, no temple is without some portions of it. It contains 550 stories of the former incarnations of Budha. A few of them are given in Upham's Sacred Books of Ceylon. Most of them are dull and pointless, without moral or wit, serving neither for instruction nor amusement. One item is, that the Nada Jutaka relates the story of a royal henza, or swan, the king of the birds, who assembled all his subjects upon a vast plane, in order that his daughter might choose a husband from amongst them. The young princess selected the peacock for her consort. The peacock was so much puffed up with pride and vanity, by the preference shown him, that he immediately began to dance and spread out his tail in exultation. His Royal Majesty was so much shocked at the conduct of the peacock, that he at once broke off the match.

THE CONTENTED MAN.

Why need I strive or sigh for wealth?
It is enough for me
That Heaven hath sent me strength and health,
A spirit glad and free;
Grateful these blessings to receive,
I sing my hymn at morn and eve.

On some, what floods of riches flow!
Houses, herds, and gold have they—
Yet life's best joys they never know,
But fret their hours away;
The more they have, they seek increase—
Complaints and cravings never cease.

A vale of tears this world they call;
To me it seems so fair,
It countless pleasures hath for all,
And none denied a share.
The little birds, on new-fledged wing,
And insects, revel in the spring.

For love of us, hills, woods, and plains,
In beauteous hues are clad,
And birds sing, far and near, sweet strains,
Caught up by echoes glad.
"Rise," sings the lark, "your tasks to ply;"
The nightingale sings "lullaby."

And when the golden sun goes forth,
And all like gold appears;
When bloom o'erspreads the glowing earth,
And fields are ripening ears—
I think these glories that I see,
My kind Creator made for me.

Then loud I thank the Lord above,
And say, in joyful mood,
His love, indeed, is father's love,
He wills to all men good.
Then let me ever grateful live,
Enjoying all he deigns to give.

ANNIVERSARY STATISTICS.

The American Board.

A meeting in behalf of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was held at the Broadway Tabernacle on the 12th inst., when one of the Secretaries read the following statement:—

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has under its care twenty-eight missions, which occupy one hundred and eleven stations and thirty-eight regular out-stations. Of these missions, seven are among the aborigines of our own country; two are in Africa, (one on the western coast, the other in the territory of the Zulus, near Port Natal, on the south-east side of the continent;) one is in Greece; one to the Jews in Turkey; four are among the nominal Christians in the midst of the Mohammedanism of Western and Central Asia; seven are on the continent in India, and one on the island of Ceylon; three are in China, to which a fourth is now to be added; and the remaining two are in the lovely isles of the Pacific. Since the annual meeting in October last, information has been received of the death of two missionaries, one unordained assistant missionary, and one female assistant missionary. Six missionaries and one female assistant missionary, who at that date were in this country, have returned to their fields of labor; twenty-three new laborers, of whom six are ordained ministers, have been sent, making the present number of missionaries (not including eight at the Sandwich Islands, who, with six lay and fourteen female laborers, are entirely supported independently of the Board) to be 161; of unordained or assistant missionaries 27; and of female assistant missionaries, 219; the whole number of laborers sent from this country is, therefore, 407. With them are associated 39 native preachers, and 192 other native helpers, making the total number of laborers connected with the missions, and supported by their funds, to be 638. Seventeen missionaries, and seven assistant missionaries, are now under appointment and expecting soon to depart—three missionaries to Micronesia, several to the Armenian, and others to other missions. From 11 printing establishments 37,127,251 pages of the Word of God, and of divine truth in other forms, were issued during the last year; the whole of the issues from the beginning being more than 958,000,000 of pages. In the nine seminaries, 23 boarding-schools, and 712 schools in the missions, between 23,000 and 24,000 pupils receive instruction, which, with the blessing of God, will not only be to their salvation, but furnish pastors and other well qualified agents for the work of evangelization. One hundred and three churches, under the care of the missions, contain nearly 26,000 members in full communion, of whom 2,016 were received during the year last reported. The receipts from August 1, 1853, to May 1, 1854, have been $213,200 17, being $3,847 32 more than in the corresponding months of the previous financial year. The expenditures of the year will, however, necessarily fall not much below $330,000. During the remaining three months, $116,800, or $38,900 per month, must therefore be contributed, to enable the Treasurer, at the end of the year, to exhibit no deficit. The amount received into the treasury during these months of last year was $95,702 73, or an average of $31,900 per month. In the present brief statement no attempt will be made to depict the progress of the great work in which the Board, in common with other similar organizations, is engaged. We can only say, in the most general terms, that never has the enterprise that has for its object the conquest of the world to the Saviour's crown, presented an aspect more animating to faith, or more solemnly impressive, than it does at the present moment.

American Female Guardian Society.

This Society held its Anniversary in Mercer-street church, Chancellor Ferris presiding. The receipts have been $17,869; expenditures, $14,090; the balance of $3,779 being payments made in advance for the Guardian.

The Home of the Friendless has been remarkably healthy during the year. Whole number of children received since the institution was opened, to May 1, 1854, including readmissions, 1597; whole number of adults, 2494; total, 4091. Received since May 1, 1853, children, 264; adults, 335; total, 599. Remaining in the institution, May 1, children, 81; adults, 15; total, 95.

In February last, the Society opened an industrial school for girls, now located in Thirty-fourth street, near Sixth avenue. 105 names have been registered. The children are supplied with dinner. Some thirty ladies have volunteered their services in teaching, on alternate afternoons, in order to supply the several classes. The pupils have made 158 articles. A marked improvement has been manifest, and various good results are recorded. It is believed that many will thus be induced to forsake an idle, vagrant life, and aspire to something better.

Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

The seventeenth annual meeting of this Board was held in Dr. McElroy's Church. From the annual report, which was read, we obtain the following facts: Receipts from all sources (including a balance of last year of $618 97) have been $174,453 02; expenditures $173,185 50; leaving a balance of $1,267 52.

The Board has Missions among the Jews, the Indians, and the Chinese in California, in North America; in South America; on the continent of Europe; in Western Africa; in Northern India; in Siam and China, embracing 2 separate Missions, 59 ordained missionaries, 3 licentiate preachers, 109 male and female assistant missionaries, 2 native helpers, 26 churches, and about 500 native communicants; 53 schools and 4,050 pupils, 6 printing presses, from which have been issued more than 6,000,000 of pages during the last year.

THE GREAT EASTERN QUESTION.

Dr. John Thomas of England, author of a work entitled Elpis Israel, gives the following as a Bible view of "the great Eastern Question now pending, and which causes so much anxiety to the Powers, and excites so much hope in the heart of the world:"—

I have proved in Elpis Israel, that the "secret diplomacy" which has, contrary to its own wish, created an imbroglio from which there is no issue but a war that shall change the face of the world—that this Diplomatic Imbroglio is the apparent "sign of the Son of Man in heaven," which indicates to the intelligent believer that he is about to "come as a thief." Before it came to pass, even five years before, I showed by the interpretation of the remarkable prophecy of the "three unclean spirits, like frogs," that a policy emanating from the Imperial Democratic Frog-Power, or France, would operate upon the Sultan, the Emperor of Austria, and the Pope, and cause to issue forth from each of them an unclean spirit, a belligerent spirit, which, in their combined workings upon the governments of the whole Romanized world, should involve them in a general war, which shall be continued till the furtive incoming of the much to-be-desired of all nations, who shall roll back the tide of devastation and death from the Holy Land upon the peoples of the papal west. Now, as far as this sign has manifested itself, it has come to pass according to my interpretation. The policy of Napoleon III. with respect to the Holy Places in Jerusalem originated the present Eastern Question. The Sultan granted the firman he sought for, by which France and the Papacy gained an advantage in the Holy Land that excited the jealousy of Russia and the Greeks. This brought the audacious Menschikoff against the Sultan, with all his demands, incompatible with the sovereignty of the Porte. The issue is war between Russia and the Sultan. The next stage of the matter into which diplomacy has already entered, is the excitation of a belligerent spirit in the Emperor of Austria. He professes a neutrality, which is believed to be dishonest; and doubtless it is, for honesty is no portion of Austrian policy. France has initiated an endeavor to make the Emperor declare himself definitely on the side of the Western Powers. The result is not yet manifested. The end, however, is certain. Between France and Russia, Austria will be forced to abandon her neutrality, and declare war on the side of Russia. French policy will stir up the Pope to the same result, and so all Europe will be in flames.

In this wide-spread conflagration, Europe and Asia, from the German and Atlantic oceans to the eastern confines of Persia, will be Russianized. The Russian empire will become a colossus and stride the world. Its head will be of gold; its breast and arms of silver; its belly and thighs of brass; its legs of iron; and its feet and toes part of clay. When it attains to this magnitude, its last Czar will be the last representative of the power styled "the king of a fierce countenance, doing according to his will." The last object of his ambition in the extension of his dominion, will be the conquest of Jerusalem and the Holy Land; which will be the last field of battle among "The Powers" for the dominion of the Old World. The invasion of this country will bring Russian and Britain face to face as the last principals in the war. Ere this, the French empire will have vanished, and France become again Bourbonized under Russia. In the end, Russia will overrun Egypt and Syria, and take Jerusalem. This is her last conquest. She will have acquired the Holy Places her superstition now prompts her to covet; while Britain will still hold the ancient countries of Edom, Moab, and a part of Ammon, on the east and south of Jordan and the Dead Sea. This relative position of Russia and Britain in the Holy Land, forms the prepared situation recorded in the Bible by Moses and the prophets. The crisis is the destruction of the Russian and British hosts, which "cover the land as a cloud," by pestilence, hail, fire, and sword, after the example of Senacherib's, so that of the Russian forces only "one-sixth part" escapes to proclaim its mysterious disaster. This extraordinary overthrow is the shattering of the colossus by the Stone of Israel, as set forth in Daniel iii. 34, 44, 45. Jerusalem and the Holy Land being thus delivered, Christ and his associates proceed with the work before them, as exhibited in what has already been expressed.

The things presented in this outline will be regarded incredulously by many. Let such produce a more scriptural and reasonable exposition of the tendency of things.

THE MINISTRY.

Last year, the Eastern Association honored us with an appointment to prepare an essay on the method of securing an able and efficient ministry. We regret our inability to fulfil that appointment. The subject is a very important one, and deserves to be discussed with an ability and thoroughness far exceeding what we could employ. The remarks we now offer are not intended as a substitute for what we would have submitted to the Association, but simply to keep the subject before our brethren, as one deserving their prayerful consideration.

We suppose that the most able ministry is that which best accomplishes the end of its institution. Its end is the conversion of sinners, and the growth of believers in grace. And as the best marksman is the one who certainly hits the object he aims at, so the best preacher of the gospel is the one who is most successful in winning souls, and in promoting their conformity to Christ. It is not the one who can bring out the most talented discourse, or make the greatest display of intellect; for there may be much "wisdom of words," where "the cross of Christ is made of no effect." But it is the one who so handles the Scriptures of Truth, that the hearers are made to feel their responsibility to God, and put in practice their duty.

But the number of ministers of this description is not large. It is of the utmost importance to know how the number may be increased; for while the ministry is weak and inefficient, Satan moves about in triumph. In order to this, however, it is important to know what is the cause of such a lamentable deficiency; for a disease is half cured, when we have intelligently determined what its origin was.

One principal reason of the lack of ministers of the true scriptural stamp, as we have often thought, is that the churches are not prepared to receive them. The same spirit which killed the prophets, and stoned the messengers of God, in ancient times, exists, to a great extent, in the churches now. A ministry that would, unhesitatingly, show to the people all their abominations, would find but little favor. One, however, who has the same worldly-minded, prayerless spirit that the great majority of Christian professors have, finds no difficulty in securing favor. The people receive him, because he lets their darling sins alone. Of old, the prophets prophesied falsely, and the people loved to have it so. Jer. 5:31. It is even so now. The people love to have a ministry that yields to all their prejudices, and justifies all their departures from truth, and God gives them what they make choice of. They sometimes pray, it is true, that God will search their hearts, and try their ways, and see if there be any wicked way in them; but he knows there is no sincerity in them, when they thus pray, and that, if he were to search them by a powerful ministry, they would only rebel against it. He therefore leaves them to enjoy that which they are determined to have.

Let the churches come to their senses in this matter. Let them know, and feel, that God will give them just about such a ministry as they are prepared to receive and profit by. If they have itching ears, and will not endure sound doctrine, they may expect to be treated accordingly. It has always been God's method "with the froward to show himself froward." Ps. 18:26. If people receive not the love of the truth, that they may be saved, it must not be a matter of surprise that God sends them strong delusion, that they may believe a lie.

The ruling spirit of the age seems to be the love of gain. It has corrupted the church to an alarming degree. The avenues to wealth are so numerous and broad, that God's people cannot resist the temptation to enter them. A godly ministry—a ministry after the apostolic pattern—must necessarily come into collision with this spirit. Its warnings against it will be oft repeated, and its conflict with it will be uncompromising. The church cannot bear such a ministry. And while we hold it to be the duty of all good people to labor for the correction of this evil, by entreaties and prayers, and every other method of a persuasive kind, we are much of the opinion that, till some providential check is given to the all-grasping, money-getting spirit of the age, so as to remove the temptation out of the way of God's people, and perhaps strip them even to poverty besides, the church will continue to stand in the way of raising up such a ministry as is most imperiously demanded.

"SHADY SIDE CHANGED TO SUNNY SIDE."—Under this head the Religious Herald makes public the following instructive facts, from which it appears that our old friend and classmate has fallen into good hands:—

"It seems that Wm. Clift, pastor of the church at Stonington, Ct., had, like not a few other ministers, been receiving a salary which failed to meet his expenses. Instead of calling on the people to increase it, he gave himself to editorial and other pen-labor, endeavoring by this extra employment to make good the deficiency in his income. After working thus assiduously for the benefit of the church for some years, he received a call to a city church which made more liberal or just allowance for ministerial support, and he concluded to change his field of labor. To the surprise and sorrow of his people, he preached a plain, out-spoken sermon to them from 1 Cor. 9:14—"Even so hath God ordained that they who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel," and concluded by requesting them to unite with him in calling a council to dissolve their connection. The church appointed a committee to ascertain the facts, who reported that Mr. Clift had incurred a debt of $1,500, and been forced to devote time and strength to other means of securing a support. Thereupon the church with great unanimity voted to present the pastor with $1,500 to meet past arrearages, to raise his salary from $800 to $1,500 per annum, and to appropriate $100 a year toward a pastor's library."

PRAYER.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
Unuttered or expressed—
The motion of a hidden fire,
That trembles in the breast

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear,
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near."

Adoration, as it looketh up to God from a lowly heart, is prayer. Confession, bursting from a full soul lying contritely in the dust before the great Law-giver and Judge, is prayer. Thanksgiving and praise, leaping up from a spirit jubilant in the assurance of forgiveness and mercy, is prayer. Petition, humbly, confidingly craving mercy, guidance and blessings, is prayer.

Prayer is one of the most reasonable, appropriate, and indeed essential exercises of a dependent and needy being. It is an essential component of all piety. All religions have prayer as one of their most important and regular duties. All men pray in sudden and overwhelming dangers or calamities, whatever may have been their previous belief or practice. The very relations of our spirits to Deity demand, insure this spontaneous appealing. It gives strength, and life, and permanency to religious feelings and resolutions. It is approved by universal intelligence, whenever fully comprehended and appreciated.

The Scriptures, likewise, affirm its importance—demand its practice. They command us to pray without ceasing. They predicate upon its faithful performance many and precious promises. They have recorded for our benefit many bright and cheering examples of those who were constant and prevalent in prayer. They tell us that the prayers of the righteous are all noticed in heaven. One of their chief lines of distinction between saint and sinner is drawn in prayer.

Acceptable prayer is the prayer of faith. It is a prayer founded on a firm belief in God—in Christ—in the Holy Spirit—in the Word of God—in His providences—in an unshaken belief that we shall receive what we pray for. Acceptable prayer is prayer offered according to and at the promptings of the Spirit of God—where His spirit kindly enlightens our ignorance, warms our coldness, softens our hardness, and leads us to pray in the true Bible spirit and manner. Acceptable, prevailing, effectual prayer, is prayer gushing up from a soul impelled by unselfish motives, towards a definite, all-absorbing object, with strong and urgent desires commensurate with that object, and a perseverance, an importunity, that will take no denial—the whole pervaded by an entire consecration of wishes, purposes, and life, to the will of the Lord. The effectual prayer is a prayer of deeds as well as of words. The hands must pray with the lips. The great burden of our hearts in prayer must be the great object of all our activities.

The objects of prayer are numerous and varied. In the language of an eminent Divine, we may turn all, everything into prayer. Every new and clearer view of ourselves, of others, of the world, every act or event of life, may become the subject of prayer. It is related of President Edwards, that he was in the habit of making every item of news, which he gleaned from newspapers or elsewhere, the occasion of raising his thoughts to heaven in prayer. Our spirits should be so attuned in the spirit and exercise of prayer, that all times and methods will be cheerfully accepted for the performance of this duty—not only the searching, earnest devotions of the closet, but also the more methodical exercises of social or public prayer—not only at stated periods, and in seasons of perplexity, or on great occasions or undertakings, but also at the slightest movings of the spirit in broken ejaculations or the silent breathings of our desires. In the language of the following truly beautiful stanzas, it may be said:

"Go when the morning shineth,
Go when the noon is bright,
Go when the eve declineth,
Go in the hush of night;
Go with pure mind and feeling,
Fling earthly thoughts away,
And, in thy closet kneeling,
Do thou in secret pray.

"Or, if 'tis e'er denied thee
In solitude to pray,
Should holy thoughts come o'er thee
When friends are round thy way,
E'en then the silent breathing,
Thy spirit raised above,
Will reach His throne of glory,
Where dwells eternal love."

How important is unceasing prayer! Without it, how weak is man! With it, how strong! Well may it be said, in the language of Tupper:

Frail art thou, O man! as a bubble on a breaker,
Weak, and governed by externals, like a poor bird caught in a storm;
Yet thy momentary breath can still the raging waters,
Thy hand can touch a lever that may move the world.
How strong, yet how most weak; in utter poverty, how rich;
What possible omnipotence to good is dormant in a man!
Behold that fragile form of delicate transparent beauty,
Whose light blue eye and hectic cheek are lit by the balefires of decline;
All droopingly she lieth, as a dew-laden lily,
Her flaxen tresses, rashly luxuriant, dank with unhealthy moisture;
Hath not thy heart said of her, Alas! poor child of weakness?
Thou hast erred; Goliath of Gath stood not in half her strength;
Terribly she fighteth in the van as the virgin daughter of Orleans;
She beareth the banner of Heaven, her onset is the rushing cataract,
Seraphim rally at her side, and the captain of that host is God,
And the serried ranks of evil are routed by the lightning of her eye:
She is the king's remembrancer, and steward of many blessings,
Holding the buckler of security over her unthankful land:
For that weak, fluttering heart, is strong in faith assured;
Dependence is her might, and behold—she prayeth."

Are we conscious of having this strength in God? Have we the assurance that our prayers find audience in heaven? If not, may the Lord teach us, and give us the spirit of acceptable, unceasing, prevailing prayer.

PRO-SLAVERY BOOKS.

On the subject of slavery, the book publishers and book-publishing Societies seem just now to stand between two fires. On one side, the opponents of slavery charge them—and in some instances no doubt justly—with adapting the books they print to southern tastes, by expurgating them of all sentiments favorable to universal freedom and the right of every man to enjoy and dispose of the fruits of his own labor. On the other side, the upholders of slavery charge them with printing books the influence of which is against their darling institution. The result is likely to be a division on this question. Indeed, for some time past a concern has been in operation at Cincinnati, Ohio, for the purpose of supplying in their integrity such works as the large publishing Societies, out of regard to southern prejudices, have emasculated or neglected to issue. And now it appears that the Methodist Church South is about to establish a book concern to publish works adapted to the tastes of slave-holders. At a recent meeting of that body in Columbus, Georgia, this was the principal topic of discussion, and "concern" was determined upon.

The Southern Argus, printed at Norfolk, Va., notices this movement in the following exultant strain:—

"Some of the religious Societies whose houses of publication are located in northern cities, have been converted into instruments of anti-slavery propagandism. In tracts of a purely religious character, abolition sentiments are interpolated, and diffused through the South. This characteristic achievement of Yankee cunning has suggested to the General Conference of the Methodist Church South, the necessity of the establishment of a Book Concern, which, being under the control of southern men, will be made an instrument for the diffusion of a sound southern sentiment. The administrative talent of Smith, Early and Ralston, affords a sufficient guaranty that the scheme, if undertaken, will be successfully carried out. One instance of triumphant experiment would induce imitation, and ultimately all the religious communities of the South would become the efficient champions of southern interests."

An exchange suggests, that it is not the abolition sentiments read in books circulated at the South, but the habit of reading at all, that needs repression. "If the teachers are shot, like Prof. Butler, or imprisoned, as Mrs. Douglass was in Norfolk, they can do little harm; but if allowed to pursue their calling in the States south of the Potomac, they are sure to work harm to Slavery, no matter how thoroughly their text-books may be weeded. Even the Methodist Church South will not be able to prune its Bible of all such awkward precepts as 'Break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free'—'Remember those in bonds as bound with them'—'Whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so unto them'—'Love thy neighbor as thyself,' &c., &c.; and what can be the use of accommodating other volumes to the exigencies of slavebreeding, where the Book of books is still permitted to talk in this incendiary fashion? No: the only radical, efficient cure for the evil, is to be found in abolishing books and teachers altogether."

A JEW ON PROTESTANTISM.

Several weeks ago we copied from the (London) Christian Times an article in relation to the secession of a party of British Jews on the ground that the traditions of the fathers are not binding, and that the Old Testament—or, as the Protestants express it, the Bible, and the Bible alone—is the religion of Israelites. In a recent number of the Hebrew Observer we find that article, accompanied with the following among other remarks:—

"It is certainly a mistake to suppose that the entire party of movement and progress are committed to a principle involving the rejection of oral tradition as binding upon Israel. The rejection of oral tradition would place Judaism on a parallel with Protestantism. Now, although Protestantism in Christianity is not only a possibility, but even an advance, yet Protestantism in Judaism is a nonentity, and if attempted, a suicidal act. Christianity, discarding every thing which is ritual and ceremonial in the code of Moses, does not require any explanation for laws, the practice of which has only a typical, historical, or antiquarian interest for it. Thus, for instance, the Sabbath, having been transferred from the seventh to the first day, ceases to be, with Christians, a Divine institution. It is kept because it is convenient to do so; hence all the Divine laws with reference to the rest enjoined, fall to the ground. Christians, therefore, need care very little to know the performance of what kind of labor constituted a desecration of the Sabbath, and made the profaner liable to the punishment of death. But it is quite different with the Jews. Upon them all the Mosaic laws, however they may be classified, are equally binding; with them, therefore, an inquiry into the nature of the work prohibited on the day of rest, under the penalty of death, acquires a practical interest. The judge who may have to pronounce the doom of an individual accused of the profanation of the Sabbath, must, when the text of the law is not sufficiently explicit, have recourse to precedent, and to the interpretation given to the law by such as are supposed to have been more fully acquainted with the meaning of it, derived from superior sources now no longer accessible to him."

To the foregoing, a Christian correspondent of the Observer replies as follows:—

In the first place, the definition of Protestantism is not clear to my mind—at least, if I infer from the meaning you have given it; and, in the second place, you state that Christianity sets aside the moral law, and give several instances as a sequitem.

Now, by reference to the first, I may remark, that Protestantism can, and should, only be considered in opposition to Popery—of whatever denomination it may assume, whether Grecian or Roman; and consequently, as to the second, Christianity not only does not set aside the moral law, but confirms it.

Christians, since the resurrection of their Leader, (the second person in the Trinity, one in power and glory with God the Father and the Holy Spirit,) have, in remembrance of the same, and no doubt by his authority, substituted the Sabbath-day to the first day of the week, because he is Lord of the Sabbath; and though there are many professing Christianity who make it a holiday, a day of recreation, so as to suit their peculiar views, the real Christian considers it as holy and binding as any of the ten commandments.

The ritual law is distinct from the moral law, and must of necessity be so, since the formula of public worship is different—that of the Jews the prototype, that of the Christians the type, such as Circumcision and the Passover by the former, while the latter possess that of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

I might enter into detail upon these points, but I forbear, seeing I cannot either add to, or detract from, the principles of Christianity so clearly in the New Testament.

How true to my mind are the words of that champion of Christianity, Paul of Tarsus, who, when addressing the Hebrews, said, "Blindness in part hath happened unto Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles is come in, when all Israel shall be saved."

The times we live in are momentous, and not only so, but they afford great consolation to the Christian, who, while anticipating the indignation to be severe, and short, faith gives him that anchor of the soul which is sure and steadfast, until he enjoys "the rest that remaineth for the people of God."

Your faithful correspondent, Z.

To this the editor of the Observer says:

"Our correspondent, a devout Christian, is determined to introduce into a Jewish Journal his Christian views. We will indulge him for this time, as we perhaps provoked the controversy. His classification is arbitrary, at least not borne out by the Hebrew Scriptures, and has therefore no authority for Jews. It is not for us to examine the arguments he alledges for the change of the Sabbath. But if he wishes to see this point properly discussed, we refer him to the 'Sabbath Recorder,' an American paper, the organ of the seventh-day keepers, devout Christians like himself, and who, nevertheless, have arrived at the conclusion, that the seventh, and not the first day, is the true Sabbath, and which they accordingly celebrate."

BAPTIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

We learn from the Christian Chronicle, that the American Baptist Historical Society, which was organized a year ago, celebrated its first Anniversary on the 15th inst. Dr. Stow of Boston presided. In the absence of the Secretary, H. G. Jones, Jun., Esq., by illness, Dr. Belcher acted in that capacity. Prayer was offered by Rev. Sidney Dyer of Indiana. Dr. Stow made some introductory remarks, which were appropriate to the occasion, and listened to with deep interest. His allusions to past times and the men that then spoke and acted, were truly affecting. He spoke of the noble aims of the Society, the great and important work to be done to collect the materials for a history of the Baptist Church that should extend, not only to Munster, but to the days of John the Baptist.

Mr. Belcher then read the Annual Report of the Curators. Their first meeting was held on the 11th of May, 1853. Dr. Belcher was elected President. An address was issued to the members of the Baptist Church upon the subject of the benefits of such an historical association. Corresponding members of every State in the Union were then elected. Up to the date of the report, 114 corresponding members had been elected. Many of them had promised to aid in the attainment of the objects of the society. The Curators stated that they had very little of a tangible character to present. But they had acquired possession of a number of valuable manuscripts, pamphlets, and jubilee medals. A number of the members had been assigned tasks of preparing memoirs of distinguished ministers of the Baptist Church, and the history of their labors; and more valuable works might be expected. One great object of the Society was to obtain a history of the Baptists in each State. The Curators spoke in praise of a kindred institution, "The Backus Historical Society," located in the city of Boston. In conclusion, they made an earnest appeal for aid in their labors.

The Rev. C. Billings Smith moved the adoption of the report, and in support of the motion, proceeded to deliver an address upon the philosophy of history, and the Baptist element in history. It was distinguished by great force of thought, fertility of illustration, and beauty of language. He traced the progress of various sects, and particularly that of the Baptists. He considered the Baptist principle to be the individual in opposition to the mass. He said the object of the Society was not to write the history of the Church—the time had not come for that—its mission had scarcely begun—the object was to collect materials for history.

Dr. Dowling made an eloquent and feeling address in connection with receiving in behalf of the Society an elegant portrait of the Rev. Dr. Staughton, as presented by Dr. Fahnestock, of Bordentown. It was true to life, and incased in a splendid gilt frame. It was taken when the Doctor was at the zenith of his popularity, and is probably the best that ever was taken. Dr. Dowling gave a little sketch of Dr. Staughton as a preacher, and related some touching incidents in his life.

The Rev. Mr. Banvard, of New York, closed the meeting with prayer.

This is an important Society, and has made a good beginning in collecting materials for a history of the Baptist Church. We are gratified to learn, that probably the Rev. J. N. Brown will immediately enter upon labors to effect such an end. Mr. Brown's attention has been turned in that direction for many years, and he is confident that he sees his way clear back to the days of the apostles, and can trace a history of the Baptists to those times, and thus place them immovably upon the foundation of Christ and those who spoke as moved by the Holy Ghost. It will require two or three years to write the history; but when completed, it will be of inestimable value.

The following is the list of officers for the coming years:—

President—Rev. William R. Williams, D. D., of New York.

Vice Presidents—Rev. John M. Peck, D. D., Ill.; Rev. Wm. Hague, D. D., N. J.; Rev. Baron Stow, D. D., Mass.; Rev. R. B. C. Howell, D. D., Va.

Corresponding Secretary—Rev. J. Newton Brown.

Rec. Secretary—Horatio G. Jones, Jr., Esq

Treasurer—Rev. Benjamin R. Loxley.

Curators—Rev. Joseph Belcher, D. D., Rev. John Dowling, D. D., Rev. J. Lansing Burrows, Rev. Heman Lincoln, Wilson Jewell, M. D., John Hanna, Esq., J. P. Crozer, W. B. Jacobs, and some others.

[At a meeting, next day, of the parent society, "The American Baptist Publication Society," on which the "Historical Society" is engrafted, a vote of thanks was unanimously passed, to be presented to Dr. Fahnestock, for the valuable donation to the Historical Society of the portrait of Dr. Staughton.]

EDUCATION OF WOMAN.

The Board of Managers of the American Woman's Educational Association held a meeting in New York on the 13th inst. From the report of the agent, Rev. W. L. Parsons, it appears that the Society has just terminated the second year of its existence, and that its leading and comprehensive object is to develop, and bring to bear upon society, the immense moral and educational power of woman. The principles underlying the movement were stated to be:—

1. That virtue and intelligence are the radical and only effectual safeguards of American institutions.

2. That the only hope of securing the virtue of a people lies in the right training of childhood.

3. That woman is the natural and appropriate educator and rector of childhood. She is every way better constituted for the work than man.

4. That the calling and profession of woman to teach, to construct fundamentally the habits and morals of generations, and hence to fix their destinies in life, ought to be so elevated, honored and rewarded, that, instead of being ever repulsive, it will command the best talent and the most heroic endeavors of the most highly cultivated, and even the most pecuniarily independent, of the sex.

The report further states, that the Association are aiding to establish institutions, in the new States, for the education of woman in accordance with their ideal of her responsibilities and duties. These schools are to be organized upon the college plan, with a faculty of coëqual teachers, and are to be supported, in part, by endowments, so that they may be as good for woman as the colleges are for men. Each institution, beside the literary and scientific, has its domestic and health departments, wherein pupils shall be trained for the practical duties of life, wherein woman shall be qualified to do for the world what only the true mother can do. She is the presiding genius of the home, where goodness and greatness, where personal happiness and public prosperity, combine their strength and exert it for good. The nation will be as its homes; the homes will be what the mothers make them; the mothers will be what their teachers determine; therefore let the standard of the mother and teacher rise to their own summit of importance. Each institution has also its Normal-Department for the training of teachers for the common schools, or for instructors and governesses in the family. The Association has already, in its infancy, secured the establishment of two institutions on its proposed plan, and is laboring to raise for each an endowment of $20,000. One is located at Milwaukee, Wis.; the other at Dubuque, Iowa.

PARENTAL DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES.

(Concluded.

Reason teaches that the education of our children should have reference to their preparation for their highest destiny; and as religion teaches, most emphatically, the doctrine of a glorious Immortality to the righteous, the question whether we are training them for that immortality is one of no trivial import. The requirements of Jehovah, the benevolence of Christianity, and the instinct of humanity, all combine to make this duty imperative. Yet how much greater is the anxiety of even some professedly Christian parents to educate their children so that they will adorn earthly social circles, rather than shine in the society of heaven. But I will not attempt an essay. Dear parents, allow me to come right to your hearts. Are you educating your children for time only? Of what a sin are you then guilty! What! a parent—perhaps a Christian parent—and training your offspring for earth—aye, for hell—rather than for heaven! O, blessed Jesus, put it into the hearts of thy children to train their children for thee! N. V. H.

MUNIFICENT BEQUESTS.—By the will of Mr. Munson, of Utica, recently deceased, the Utica Orphan Asylum has been permanently endowed with about $34,000. Of this sum $25,000, and an interest in lands in Pennsylvania valued at $4,000, for a permanent fund. $5,000 is toward the erection of a suitable, plain and substantial building, the plans for which shall be approved by one of two architects named in the will. The bequest to the Asylum is on condition that the citizens of Utica will within five years raise the sum of $10,000 for the same object, and purchase a lot of not less than three acres within the city upon which to erect the Asylum. To Grace Church $15,000, of which $10,000 is for the purchase of a lot and for the erection of a church; $1,000 for the erection of a Sunday school-house, $500 for a Sunday-school library, $500 for a bell, $1,500 for an organ, $500 for church furniture, and $1,000 for inclosing the ground. The bequest to Grace Church is on condition that the parish shall raise within two years as much more as is necessary to carry out the plan.

BAPTIST HOME MISSION SOCIETY.—The American Baptist Home Mission Society met in Philadelphia on the 11th inst., to celebrate its 22d Anniversary. The Treasurer reported the receipt of $62,780 20 during the past year, nearly all of which has been expended in carrying on the operations of the Society. From a summary of labors and results, presented at the meeting, it appears that 184 missionaries and agents were employed during the past year. These Missionaries were distributed as follows: In Canada, (West) 1; Canada, (East) 8; New York, (near Canada) 1; Pennsylvania, 6; Delaware, 2; Ohio, 9; Michigan, 8; Indiana, 28; Illinois, 34; Wisconsin, 35; Iowa, 23; Minnesota, 8; Oregon, 4; California, 4; New Mexico, 4. Twenty-one of the number preach in the following foreign languages: French, 8; French and German, 1; French and Polish, 1; Swedish, 1; Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian, 1; German, 3; Dutch, 1; Spanish, 2; Spanish and Pueblo, 1; Spanish and Navajo Indian, 1; Chippewa and French, 1. The number of States and Territories occupied is 14. The number of stations and out-stations supplied is 612; and the aggregate amount of time bestowed upon the field, according to the reports received, is equal to that of one man for 137 years and 18 weeks. The Missionaries report the baptism of 1,322 persons; the organization of 67 churches, and the ordination of 30 ministers. Twenty-two church edifices have been completed, and 24 are in progress of building. Of the number baptized, more than 100 are known to have been previously Roman Catholics or Lutherans.

REVIVAL IN MENDHAM, N. J.—The N. Y. Evangelist says that a deeply interesting and precious work of grace has been for some time in progress in Mendham, N. J., in the Presbyterian church under the care of Rev. Thomas Hastings, Jun., of which the first fruits have recently been gathered. The religious interest has been increasing ever since Mr. H.'s settlement, a year or more ago, and instances of conversion occasionally transpired. In connection with the communion at the commencement of the year, a few extra meetings were resolved upon, which were conducted principally by the Rev. Dr. Squier, of Beloit College. These meetings disclosed an unexpected degree of feeling, and at the first inquiry meeting ten persons were found indulging hope. From that time, meetings were held some four days in the week, for several weeks, the pastor having the aid of Dr. Squier and Rev. Mr. Brayton. A noiseless but powerful work went on, conversions multiplied, old secret hopes were brought to light and resuscitated, and the impenitent almost universally affected throughout the town. As the fruit of the work, one hundred and sixteen now stand propounded for admission to the church, and ten more have been examined. Besides these, there are not less than twenty others intelligently hoping in Christ—making the total of conversions, thus far, about one hundred and fifty. Of these, about forty are heads of families; while some are quite in youth.

INTERESTING FACTS.—At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Tract Society, letters were read from a large number of missionaries and others in Europe and in heathen countries, from which are gathered some interesting facts.

A firm in Edinburgh propose to order an edition of 20,000 copies monthly of The Child's Paper, the Society's juvenile periodical; and a London house requests casts of a portion of the Society's engravings—a handsome compliment to American art.

The Rev. Mr. Oncken of Germany solicited one hundred and fifty thousand pages of German tracts and fifty libraries of German books, to be loaned at preaching stations, and the grant was authorized.

The Rev. Mr. Schauffer of Turkey speaks of the enthusiasm of the Mohammedans in the existing war; of the conflagration at Salonica; of the bombardment of Odessa, where two of his sisters reside; and of the starving condition of poor Turks thrown out of employment while provisions are at war prices. The missionaries at Bebek have provided for the support of one hundred souls for two months.

The Rev. Dr. Perkins of Oroomiah, Persia, states that he has just put to press the last sheets of Baxter's Saints' Rest in Syriac, at the Society's expense, and is proceeding with other works. He communicates the interesting fact, that a revival of religion is in progress in the two seminaries at Oroomiah.

THE MAINE LAW AT HOME.—The Rev. W. W. Lovejoy of Waterville, Maine, in a private letter to Rev. W. R. G. Miller of Auburn, Mass., incidentally says:

"You wish to know how the Maine Law works here. Admirably! Liquor is still sold clandestinely, in some places. No law can prevent that at once and entirely. But its public distribution is everywhere suppressed, and a drunken man is rarely seen. The people are prompt and energetic in the enforcement of the statute; and the state of morality is altogether higher than formerly. Strenuous efforts were made at the last election to bring about a repeal of the law, but failed. It is too well established, and its beneficial effects too apparent. The stories which are circulated in New York and the West to the contrary are mere humbugs gotten up by its enemies."

BAPTIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY.—The American Baptist Publication Society held its 30th Annual Meeting in Philadelphia on the 11th inst. From reports presented on the occasion, it appears that the receipts of the Society last year were $49,612 18, of which $35,218 56 was from sales, and the remainder from donations to the colportage fund, the building fund, &c. The Society has now 450 publications, of which 208 are bound volumes, and the remainder tracts.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 15.

In the SENATE, resolutions from the Massachusetts Legislature against the Aimstad claim were presented; also, the proceedings of a meeting in Philadelphia in favor of the Homestead bill; the Map of the United States, Mexico, Isthmus of Darien, and the West Indies, as recently corrected at the General Land Office, was ordered to be printed. The Senate then proceeded to consider the resolution in favor of religious freedom of Americans abroad. Mr. Cass having the floor, made a speech of great length in favor of the resolution. The vetoed bill granting land to the insane was ordered to be printed as it passed Congress. The Senate then adjourned.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES met at the usual hour, and after a renewal of the contest for Freedom, Mr. Richardson moved that the debate on the Nebraska bill be closed on Sabbath-day next at meridian, which was carried by a vote of 114 to 59. The consideration of the Pacific Railroad bill was postponed until the 24th inst. by a vote of 123 to 53, and at six o'clock the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 16.

In the SENATE, Mr. Mallory of Florida offered a resolution declaring that the course pursued by Spain in relation to the Island of Cuba, gives just reason to apprehend that her design is to carry out a policy which is calculated to renew the scenes at St. Domingo, and that such a course is detrimental to the interests of the people of the United States. The consideration of the President's message vetoing the Indigent Insane bill, was then resumed, and Mr. Butler of South Carolina spoke his hour in defense of the veto.

The HOUSE, after the usual opening business, went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Nebraska bill. After considerable excitement and confusion, Mr. Maxwell of Florida obtained the floor and addressed the Committee in favor of the bill. Messrs. Mayall of Maine, Flagler of New York, and Giddings of Ohio, followed in opposition to the bill.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 17.

In the SENATE, the bill giving the Port Huron and Erie Railroad Company the right of way through the Military Reservation at Fort Gratiot, was passed. Mr. Clayton then called the attention of the Senate to the humanity and generosity of the officers of the British steamer Virago, in rescuing Lieut. Strain's Surveying party, and offered a joint resolution expressing the gratitude of Congress therefor. The resolution offered by Mr. Mallory, concerning the Africanization of Cuba, was then taken up, when a long debate ensued.

The HOUSE, immediately after the opening business, went into Committee of the Whole, and the debate on the Nebraska bill was resumed. Messrs. Ready of Tennessee, and Straub of Pennsylvania, spoke in favor of the bill, and Messrs. Etheridge of Tennessee, Bennett of New York, and Wade of Ohio, opposed it.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 18.

In the SENATE, Mr. Brodhead presented the memorial of Senor Atocha, praying to be allowed a claim rejected by the late Board of Commissioners on Mexican claims. The resolution increasing the compensation of the Globe for reporting debates, was resumed, and after considerable debate, adopted.

In the HOUSE, the Speaker presented a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting copies of correspondence which had passed between the United States and England with regard to the rights of neutrals. The testimony taken before the Select Committee on Military Superintendencies was ordered to be printed; the majority of the Committee agreed to the report favorable to restoring the civil superintendency. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Nebraska bill. Messrs. Banks of Mass, Peckham of New York, Taylor of Tennessee, Wentworth of Mass., and Meacham of Vermont, addressed the Committee in opposition to the bill. Mr. Miller of Missouri, supported it. At 11½ o'clock the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 19.

In the SENATE, Mr. Cooper laid on the table, to have printed, a substitute for the bill suspending the collection of duties on railroad iron. A bill establishing an additional Land District in Florida was passed. Mr. Slidell offered a resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of taking some measure expressive of the appreciation by Congress of the conduct of Capt. Fitch and officers of the steamship Washington in rescuing the passengers of the ship Winchester; and, also, as to the expediency of a general law providing for a compensation in such cases—passed. The remainder of the session was devoted to the consideration of the private calendar. Adjourned until Second-day.

In the HOUSE, on motion of Mr. Dawson of Penn. the Secretary of the Treasury was requested to inquire into the propriety of establishing at the Philadelphia Mint a department to strike off medals commemorative of patriotic services. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Nebraska bill. Messrs. Wheeler and Dean of New York, Morrison of New Hampshire, Benton of Missouri, Benson of Maine, Knox of Illinois and Pratt of Connecticut addressed the Committee in opposition to the bill; and Messrs. Walsh of New York, Hamilton of Maryland, Dunham of Indiana and Goode of of Virginia in favor of it.

SABBATH-DAY, MAY 20.

The HOUSE met at 9 o'clock and resumed the consideration of the Nebraska bill. Messrs. Harlan and Stuart of Ohio, Goodrich and Edmunds of Mass., Pennington of New Jersey, made speeches against the bill; and Messrs. Stanton of Tenn., Henn of Iowa, Witte of Penn., and Chastain of Georgia, spoke in favor of the bill. Twelve o'clock, the hour for the general debate to terminate, having arrived, on motion, all the gentlemen who had not succeeded in obtaining the floor, were accorded the privilege of printing their speeches. Several amendments to the bill were offered and rejected; and at 3 o'clock, without taking a vote, the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

☞ A bill to abolish capital punishment, debated at great length in the Ohio State Senate, was finally lost by two votes.

European News.

By the steamers Europa and Franklin we have European dates to May 10th.

Official advices are received of the bombardment of Odessa. The works of the harbor have been destroyed, two powder magazines blown up, twelve small Russian vessels of war sunk, and thirteen transports captured, all with the loss of eight men killed and eighteen wounded in the allied fleet. The Russians acknowledge four men killed and sixty-four wounded; but credible letters from some of the inhabitants state that 300 were killed, 300 seriously, and 300 slightly wounded.

From the Danube there is a new report of a decisive victory gained by Omar Pasha over Gen. Luders, but of this affair we have nothing beyond a telegraphic dispatch by way of Vienna, the great manufactory of stock jobbing hoaxes. The story runs, that the Turks, 70,000 strong, overhauled Lüders somewhere between Silistria and Rassova, the latter being a place on the Danube some ten miles above Chernavoda, and that while Omar Pasha was pressing the Russians in front, another corps, sent around for the purpose, fell upon their flank, and so between the two fires they were used up.

It appears that the hostilities against Russia are to be carried out on a much larger and grander scale by the Allied Powers, and the Paris Moniteur of the 6th inst. announces that the French and British Governments have agreed in the adoption of all the measures of precaution which the present war may render necessary. With this object the Emperor has decided on the formation of two camps. The first of 100,000 men, will be established between Montreuil and St. Omer, and the second of 50,000, near Marseilles.

The policy of the Shah of Persia appears to have become hostile to Russia. He claims the restoration of the ancient provinces, and was putting in force an army of 50,000 men.

Hopes are now entertained of the safety of the steamer City of Glasgow. A dismasted steamer answering to her description was seen near the Azores, and it is conjectured that her passengers have been landed there.

Rescue of Shipwrecked Passengers.

The steamship Washington, which arrived at New York on the 14th inst., rescued from impending death some five hundred passengers of the wrecked ship Winchester. A passenger by the Washington furnishes to the N. Y. Tribune an account of the matter, which we abridge as follows:—

On the morning of the 2d of May, while under a furious gale, the sea rolling mountain high, the passengers of the Washington were called on deck by the intelligence of a dismasted vessel drifting in the direction of the steamer. About 10 A. M. we were near enough to enable Capt. Fitch to hail the vessel, and ascertain that she was the Winchester, from Boston, the captain of which entreated Capt. Fitch to stay by his ship and save the passengers and crew. The latter was in a difficult position. To lower the boats and venture out upon the waves, tremendously lashed by the gale, was a most perilous undertaking. Besides, the Washington was filled with passengers and heavily laden. On the other side, hundreds of human lives were at stake. The humane captain of the Washington, however, quickly decided. He communicated to his passengers his resolution not to proceed until all was done within human power in saving the people on board the wreck. No sooner had Capt. Fitch made known his noble resolution, than Mr. King, first officer of the Washington, at once stepped forth and called upon the crew for volunteers to board the wreck. From among the brave sailors who, without exception, offered their services, he chose four excellent seamen. A life-boat was lowered. Mr. King, with his men, ventured out upon an enterprise, the obvious dangers of which could not but excite the highest admiration for their heroism, as well as the truest regard for their self-forgetful love of their fellow-men. All eyes were fixed upon the boat, in which these heroes, after superhuman exertions, at length succeded to get alongside the Winchester. However, it was found impracticable to board the wreck, as the sea was continually making a complete break over it and the boat. The captain of the Winchester threw a bottle into the boat, which contained a letter requesting their rescue, and stated the number of passengers and crew as being 445. Mr. King again reached the steamer in safety, and immediately left once more, with the answer of Capt. Fitch sealed up in a bottle. This time, however, the noble seamen nearly fell a sacrifice to their humane intentions. Coming near the wreck, their boat, broken in the forward air chamber, commenced to sink. Ropes were thrown from the Winchester, by means of which, first the four sailors, and last Mr. King, were snatched from a watery grave.

On board the wreck, a spectacle was presented to Mr. King, of the most heart-rending description. The passengers, of every age and sex, in a state of unspeakable anxiety, excitement and exhaustion, were partly lying on deck, and although secured by ropes, owing to the tremendous rolling of the ship, continually knocked about in such a manner that the arms, fingers, and legs of many were broken, and all suffering from painful contusions. The remainder of the passengers and crew were engaged at the pumps, which they could not leave for fear of being thrown overboard by the rolling of the vessel. Upon seeing Mr. King, those on deck crept up to him on their knees, crying piteously, and entreating him, with folded hands, to take them off the vessel. Mr. King, wet throughout, and nearly fainting, tried to console the passengers—assured them they should be taken care of, and recommended them cheerfully to work the pumps. Mr. Moore, Captain of the Winchester, was answered, that Capt. Fitch had resolved to stop until all were saved, and to leave Mr. King on board the vessel as a guaranty of his intentions. During the night, regular signals were exchanged with the Washington. There Capt. Fitch guided the movements of the steamer, which, despite the heavy gale, he always kept near the drifting Winchester, at the same time superintending the preparations for embarking and saving the passengers and crew of the wreck. Early on the morning of May 3d, four life boats were lowered, and Capt. Fitch directed their movements with so much circumspection, and assisted by his chief engineer, Mr. Matthews, watched with so much prudence, care and kindness, the getting on board of the wrecked passengers, that the whole operation was finished without the least accident. Capt. Moore and Mr. King were the last to leave the wreck, which began rapidly to go down. The wreck, twenty minutes after being totally abandoned, was engulfed by the sea. To give some idea how narrow was the escape of the last boat-load, some of the sailors of the Winchester were compelled to even abandon their clothes-bags, after in hand, to save themselves!

There was one incident of the most thrilling nature. As Mr. King of the Washington, and Capt. Moore of the Winchester, were about to take their final leave of the wrecked ship, which was just before she went down, carrying her dead to their watery grave, he thought it best to take one more glance at the corpses. "I really believe that woman breathes!" was the exclamation of one of them, as a thrill of horror mingled with hope ran through his bosom. They approached the body of a female, and placed their ears to her mouth, when lo! they discovered that one whom they had supposed dead was still breathing! They removed her on board the Washington, and she is now at the Hospital on Staten Island, in a rapid state of convalescence!

All the other ships that came alongside took only so many passengers as they had provisions for, while the Washington took on all that remained, without considering the question of provisions, &c. Lives, they felt, were more important than provisions. There were provisions enough on board the Winchester, but there was no time to save them.

The following is a list of the officers of the vessel which has so nobly and successfully served the cause of humanity in the rescue of the passengers from the unfortunate Winchester:

E. M. Fitch, Commander.	J. K. Matthews, Chief Eng.
P. W. King, Chief Officer.	V. R. Terry, Jr., 1st. Ass't.
Wm. Donaldson, 2d do.	Chas. G Fleet, 2d do.
Mr. Dwyer, 3d do.	Henry C. Maxson, Ass't.
Edward Brown, 4th do.	Mr. Kisterd, Ass't.
Dr. Fulmer, Surgeon.	Mr. Keating, Ass't.

HONOR TO VERMONT.—The Rutland (Vt.) Herald makes the following assertions with regard to the State in which it is published:

"There is but one city in the State, and not one soldier. We have no theaters nor mobs. We have no police, and not a murder has been committed within this State for the last ten years. We have no museums, opera houses, nor crystal palaces; but we have homes that are the center of the world to their inmates, for which the father works, votes, and talks; where the mother controls, educates, labors, and loves; where she rears men, scholars and patriots."

A RIGHTEOUS VERDICT.—Our readers will remember the case of the negro man Freeman, arrested and for a long time imprisoned in Indiana as a fugitive slave. His claimant having failed to prove him a slave, or Freeman having proved himself a free man, he was in process of time permitted to go at large. Thereupon he sued the would-be kidnapper for false imprisonment, and has just obtained a verdict of two thousand dollars and costs.

ADVANTAGE OF PAYING FOR A NEWSPAPER IN ADVANCE.—One of the facts put in evidence at the trial in the Supreme Court, to sustain the will of the late William Russell, was, that only a few days before he had made the will, he called at the office of the Democrat and paid for his paper a year in advance, thereby saving 50 cents. This fact was dwelt upon at length, by counsel, and commented upon by the Judge in his charge, as evidence that he was sane, and competent to make a will.

SALARIES OF CLERGYMEN.—At a meeting of the New School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, held last week in Philadelphia, resolutions were passed fixing the minimum salary of clergymen at $500 for single men, and $750 for married men.

SUMMARY.

Mr. S. Spooner, of New York, purchased in London and brought hither the original plates of "Boydell's Illustrations of Shakspere," which he restored and reïssued here at a subscription price of $50 for the set. Having partly completed his work, Mr. Spooner traveled southward to obtain subscriptions. He had obtained a number in Richmond, Va., and was going on prosperously, when John M. Daniel (now Chargé d'Affaires to Turin) came down upon him savagely in his Examiner, declaring his work a fraud, a humbug, &c., and warning Virginians to keep clear of all subscriptions to Yankee book agents, unless they chose to be cheated. This finished Mr. Spooner's business in Richmond, but he some time after caught Mr. Daniel in New York, and sued him for libel, and a Jury last week gave the plaintiff a verdict for $8,000 damages.

The Aberdeen (Scotland) Journal states that the Widow of Alexander McBeath, a seaman, belonging to Aberdeen, on board the Three Bells, of Glasgow, whose exertions cost him his life, has had transmitted to her, by the shipping-master at Glasgow, the sum of £76 16s. 6d.; the greater part of which was contributed at New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, and the remainder by Capt. Crighton and the crew of the Three Bells, on behalf of the survivors of McBeath and another lost comrade—the latter receiving an equal sum.

Twelve towns in Oneida County have chosen No License Boards at their Town Elections this year. Rome, after Utica the most important town in the County, chose a No License Supervisor, but he was overruled in the Board by Justices elected in former years, who granted some Licenses; but the Village of Rome chose a Municipal Board which has just decided (5 to 4) not to license for any but medical purposes; and so only the four drug-stores in the village are now entitled to sell.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Tuesday, May 16, 1854, says: The train on the Central Railroad which left Albany at 10½ o'clock last night, ran into a freight car on the track a mile and a half from this city, smashing the locomotive and some of the cars. Several persons were hurt and one Irishman killed, both his legs being broken and terribly mangled.

The bark Springbek, arrived at Boston, brings Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, dates to the 26th March. The papers are filled with accounts of the gold discoveries, which are said to extend over the whole sovereignty. Many pure nuggets, 40 grains, had been received at Cape Town.

Mr. Alfred Dutch, of the Chicago Commercial Advertiser, obtained a verdict of $4,000 against certain parties, at the last term of the Circuit Court, for destroying his office when acting under legal process of distress for rent. He has now another suit at this term of the Court, against those and other parties, for a conspiracy to destroy the paper and ruin him. He has laid his damages at $100,000. The defendants are men of high standing and wealth.

Very full, animated and enthusiastic educational meetings of the Connecticut State Teachers Association took place on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 10 and 11, day and evening, in the Medical College, New Haven. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Hooker on the Method of Teaching Physiology in Schools, and by the Rev. Dr. Perkins of West Meriden on Education as Developed by God's Plans with Man.

Five convicts recently attempted to escape from the State Prison at Alton, by scaling the wall. They had already reached the top, and were about to let themselves down on the outside, when three of the guard fired at them. One of the convicts fell back dead, and two others were seriously wounded, but managed to maintain their footing on the wall. The whole party were recaptured.

James Worthington, a colored barber, was arrested at Akron, Ohio, on Thursday, on a charge of counterfeiting; but it being ascertained that the real cause of his arrest was, that he was a fugitive slave, the citizens turned out in great force and prevented his removal. Considerable excitement prevailed and trouble was apprehended.

The ship Currituck, of Norfolk, Capt. Foster, from Antwerp, with merchandize and 235 passengers consigned to W. F. Schmidt & Co., arrived at New York last week, having on board Capt. Bunker, his crew, and 356 passengers, rescued from the ship Black Hawk, from Liverpool for New York, lost at sea on the 23d of April.

In Liberia, Africa, there is a plant or tree which grows 75 feet high and bears cotton in bolls similar to the common cotton plant of this country. The staple is very short, but has a soft silken texture, and is of a delicate fawn color. The odor is exactly like cotton, though its appearance is quite unlike it.

Tuscaloosa was for many years the capital of Alabama, (now transferred to Montgomery.) The Monitor, urging the people of Tuscaloosa to subscribe toward bringing a Railroad through their place, says that its real estate has fallen one-half within ten years, and is still falling at the rate of ten per cent. a year.

A Mr. Watts opened a grog-shop recently in Regmond, Miss. He was committed in default of bail. His counsel had him brought before the Court of Appeals by a writ of habeas corpus, who sustained the constitutionality of the law and the action of the magistrate.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Wednesday, May 10, 1854, says: From 20 to 25 deaths from cholera occurred among some German emigrants, on their way from New Orleans to St. Louis, on board the steamer Dresden, which arrived at St. Louis on Saturday last.

Mr. H. E. Pierrepont, of the city of Brooklyn, has presented to the First Church erected in the town of Pierrepont, St. Lawrence County, N. Y., a new and beautiful bell of 903 pounds weight, with all the necessary hangings.

Hon. Joseph L. White has purchased the farm formerly belonging to J. Fenimore Cooper, on the east side of Otsego Lake, in the vicinity of Cooperstown, and is about to erect a summer residence thereon.

A terrible explosion occurred on the 11th inst., at English Coal Pit, 14 miles from Richmond, Va. There were twenty men in the pit at the time of the explosion, all of whom were killed but one, who was taken out dreadfully injured.

Dr. Robert de Lambelle, a distinguished Physician of Paris, announces that a shock of electricity, given to patients dying from the effects of chloroform, immediately counteracts its influence and returns the sufferer to life.

A man, his wife, and about half a dozen children, passed through Cincinnati recently on their way to the wilds of the West. Their effects were being transported in a dry-goods box on truck-wheels, and "pulled along" by a woman and girl.

The Hon. Rufus Choate has resigned the Attorney-Generalship, and the Hon. John H. Clifford has been recalled to the position. It is rumored that Gov. Washburn has tendered Mr. Everett's place to Mr. Choate.

The Grand Jury of Passaic County, N. J., have presented twelve freeholders who signed a license-petition for a person who was destitute of the necessary accommodations for keeping tavern.

Our advices from Mexico by way of New Orleans, give four days later intelligence from that city, and do not confirm the accounts of Santa Anna's successes, which have been before announced.

The citizens of Coldwater, Mich., are agitating the subject of a railroad from Fort Wayne, Ind., to Grand Rapids, passing through that place, Battle Creek and Hastings.

The Hon. Edward Everett, in consequence of ill health, has resigned his seat in the United States Senate, the resignation to take effect in June.

The Cholera is making visitations here and there along the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, and also on the Ohio. So far, it has not proved very formidable.

A tavern-keeper in Woodbury, Vt., was convicted by a Jury, a few days since, of twenty-one different offenses for selling liquor.

DIED.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., May 10th, of consumption, Miss KATE S. COVEY, daughter of Jesse and Salena Covey, aged 20 years. Sister Covey experienced religion and united with the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield about one year since; and during her short experience, she gave evidence of the sincerity and ardor of her love for Christ and his Church, by her studied, cheerful and faithful walk in the way of obedience to him, and in the ordinances of his house. She was patient and resigned in her sickness and death, and we doubt not our loss is her eternal gain. J. C.

In Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y., May 11, 1854, NATHAN W. PHILIPS, aged 35 years and 22 days. Bro. Philips was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Pawcatuck, R. I., and while in the midst of life, was suddenly cut down and called to try the realities of the future. He died with full confidence in God, and a full assurance of life and immortality beyond the grave.

Western Association—Executive Board.

THE Executive Board of the Western Association will meet at Alfred Center on the morning of June 22, 1854, previous to the opening of the Association. All communications designed for the action of said Board should be forwarded to the Secretary as early as practicable, that the Board labor under no embarrassment in making their annual report.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order CHIMES of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes, in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited. A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Home.

There are, thank Heaven, beneath this fitful dome,
Some leaflets floating near affection's home;
Some cloudless skies that smile on scenes below,
Some changeless hues in life's wide-spanning bow.

So let us live, that if misfortune's blast
Comes like a whirlwind to our hearths at last,
Sunbeams may break from one small spot of blue,
To guide us safe life's dreary desert through.

Siberian Ladies and Fashions.

From Household Words we extract a passage respecting the qualifications of a Siberian bride, and the winter custume of Siberian ladies :—

"A bride is required, on arriving at her husband's house, to invite guests to a dinner that shall prove her quality, and upon which, in fact, her future reputation will depend. It must be prepared by her own hands, and both her honor and her parents' shame will be the consequence if she be found deficient. If her dinner proves a triumph, it will recommend to honorable notice, not only herself; but also the family in which she was soundly trained. Men marry for domestic comfort, in a place where they are quite unable, as bachelors, to get it. Wives, therefore, are in great demand, and women have opportunity to make choice of their own husbands, with no chance at all if they be not infirm or deformed, of dying single. Great as is the nicety of rank among the Berezovians, or inhabitants of the town of Berezov, in marriage all distinctions founded on it are set aside as inconvenient. The daughter of a poor Cossack may be courted by a high government functionary, and will not unfrequently refuse him. During the brief summer, Berezovian ladies visited and went to parties in thin attire. There was a great display of silks and satins, and all feminine finery. But when September opened with a heavy fall of snow, and the whole dirty town suddenly looked clean, and became covered with a sheet of white, the ladies and gentlemen out of doors underwent a great transformation. They all turned out like a herd of white bears, that is to say, in Ostiaks. Winter clothing, in Berezov, consists in putting on, first, a shirt of reindeer skin, with the hair inside, and over that a coat of the same make and material, but larger, with the hair outside. To this coat there is a hood, which is drawn quite over the head, and tied with a leather strap under the chin; it comes over the entire head, face included, leaving only openings for the accommodation of the eyes, the nose, and the mouth. This warm hood is formed of the skin taken from the reindeer's head, and the ears of the reindeer, left upon it, stick up as fine ornaments. The gentleman or lady—for the most fashionable Berezovian wears the dress out of doors during the winter—draws over the hands large gloves of shaggy fur, which are attached to the fur coat, and, when not used, are tucked up in the manner of cuffs. Over the feet and legs are drawn long stockings of reindeer skin, having the hair inside, and over these again are put the boots with the hair outside. The boots are made of skins taken from the reindeer's legs sewn together in strips; they cover the thighs, and are fastened by straps at the girdle. As the soles also have the hair turned outward, they assist the feet in walking over the ice. In traveling, the Ostiak, or his Russian imitator, throws a third garment of fur over the other two, having a hood that covers the whole head, and contains no opening before the eyes, nose, or mouth. So dressed, the traveler bears not the least resemblance to a human being."

How Van Diemen's Land was Discovered.

Anthony Van Diemen, Governor of Batavia, had a daughter, whose name was Maria. Since she was not only charming and accomplished, but was the only child of a rich papa, who was Governor of the Dutch East Indies, Maria's image was impressed on many a heart, and she had no lack of suitors. There were great men among them; but with maiden-like perversity, Maria most favored a poor young sailor—a handsome, dashing fellow, who was very skillful in his business, but who had no pockets, and no use for any. The young sailor's name was Abel Jansen Tasman.

He was devoted to Maria's heart and soul, had exchanged pledges with her, and had brought matters to so serious a pass, that the proud father determined to put the young adventurer quietly and courteously out of sight. The doing so he took to be a better and more fatherly course than the institution of a great family quarrel. That his Maria should become Mrs. Tasman, he knew very well was a thing not for a moment to be thought of. Whoever won his daughter must have wealth and a patent of nobility. She was no fit mate for a poor sailor. Tasman, however, could not be easily dismissed from dangling after her.

The Batavian traders had at that time a vague notion that there was a vast continent—an unknown Austral land, somewhere near the South Pole; and Van Diemen determined to send Tasman out to see about it. If he never came back it would be no matter; but, at any rate, he would be certainly a long time gone. Van Diemen therefore fitted out an expedition, and gave to young Tasman the command of it.

Off the young fellow set, in the year 1642, and like an enamored swain as he was, the first new ground he discovered—a considerable stretch of land, now forming a well-known English colony—he named it after his dear love, Van Diemen's Land, and put Miss Van Diemen's Christian name beside her patronymic, by giving the name of Maria to a small adjoining island close to the south-eastern extremity of the new land. That land—Van Diemen's Land—we have of late begun very generally to call after its discoverer, Tasmania.

Continuing his journey southward, the young sailor anchored his ships on the 8th of December, in a sheltered bay, which is called Moodenare's (Murder's) Bay, because the natives there attacked his ships, and killed three of his men. Traveling on, he reached, after some days, the island which he called after the three kings, because he saw them on the feast of the Epiphany; and then coming upon New Zealand from the north, he called it, in a patriotic way, after the States of Holland, Staten Land; but the extreme northern point of it, a fine bold headland, jutting out into the sea, strong as his love, he entitled again Cape Maria. For he had gone out resolved not indeed to "carve her name on trunks of trees," but to do his mistress the same sort of honor in a way that would be nobler, manlier, and more enduring.

After a long and prosperous voyage, graced by one or two more discoveries, Tasman came back to Batavia. He had more than earned his wife; for he had won for himself sudden, high renown, court favor, rank and fortune. Governor Van Diemen got a famous son-in-law, and there was no cross to the rest of the career of the most comfortable married couple, Abel and Maria. Tasman did not make another journey to New Zealand; it remained unvisited until 1669, when it was re-discovered by Capt. Cook, who very quickly recognized it as a portion of the land that had been first seen by the lovelorn sailor. [Household Words.

Singular Cure.

M. Flaudin, in his Narrative of a Residence in Persia, relates a curious incident which occurred when he was at Ispahan :—

"The Persian servant of a European had been stung by a scorpion, and his master wished to apply ammonia, the usual remedy in such cases, but the man refused, and ran off to the bazaar. When he returned, he said he was cured, and appeared to be so. The European, rather surprised at this almost instantaneous cure, questioned him, and found that he had been to a dervish, who enjoyed great reputation in such cases. This dervish, he said, after examining the wound and uttering a few words, had several times lightly touched it with a little iron blade. Still more astonished at the remedy than at the cure, the European desired to see the instrument by which the latter was said to have been effected. At the cost of a small pichkech he was allowed to have it for a few minutes in his possession. After a careful examination, finding nothing extraordinary in the instrument, he made up his mind that the cure was a mere trick; that the dervish was an impostor; that the scorpion's sting had not penetrated, and that his servant had been more frightened than hurt. He threw the blade contemptuously upon the table, when, to his great surprise, he beheld it attach itself strongly to a knife. The quack's instrument was simply a magnet. But what power had the loadstone's attraction over venom? This discovery was very odd; incredulity was at a nonplus; and yet the man stung by the scorpion was cured, and he who had cured him was in great renown at Ispahan for the treatment of that sort of wound. I relate these facts without comment. Who knows if science will not one day discover something as yet unknown to it, but practiced by the Persians? Have not savages remedies composed of the juice of plants, of whose existence European science is ignorant?"

Important Plankroad Decision.

At the March Term of the Court of Appeals the following decision was made in the suit of the Auburn and Cato Plankroad Company vs. Peter Douglas :—

The plaintiffs, a corporation organized under the Plankroad acts, had built their road and erected a toll-gate thereon, pursuant to such acts, opposite to the defendant's farm, which lies upon one side of the road, and contiguous thereto. After the erection of the gate the defendant moved his fence from the line of the road where it originally stood, back upon his farm some twenty or thirty feet, and graded a track by the side of the road, but entirely upon his own land, extending on both sides of the toll-gate, so that persons traveling upon the road could, if disposed, leave the road and pass over this track upon the defendant's land, and thus avoid the gate. The plaintiffs, in their complaint, state these facts, and aver that the acts of the defendant were done for the purpose and with the intent to injure the plaintiffs and defraud them of their rights; and pray for an injunction, together with damages for the injury sustained.

The answer of the defendant denies the motives attributed to him in the complaint, and insists that the fence was removed and the track graded to facilitate his farming operations, and to afford him convenient ingress and egress to and from his barn and other premises.

To this answer the plaintiffs demurred.

The Court held that the legislative acts granting franchises to corporations are to be constructed strictly according to their terms, and that the grantees in such acts take nothing by implication, either as against the power making the grant, or against other corporations of individuals.

That the acts authorizing the formation of Plankroad Companies give to such companies no interest or easement in or upon the lands adjoining their road, and no rights to restrict the use which the proprietor of such lands may make of his own premises.

That every proprietor of land has the absolute control over his own property, and may do with it whatever he pleases, unless he thereby infringes some fixed legal right of another of his own property being damnum absque injuria, unless the former has previously acquired some legal right to restrict the use which the latter shall make of such property.

That where no such right of restriction exists, it is immaterial what may be the motives of a proprietor for dealing with his own property in a particular way. If, in such case, he violates no legal right of another, although he expressly intends to do the other damage by such use, and although such damage actually results, yet no action will lie.

Held, therefrom, that the present action could not be maintained, although every fact stated in the complaint was established.

Premium for Cure of Cholera.—John Robert Breant, a scientific Frenchman, who died in Paris in 1852, left by will 100,000 francs (about $20,000) as a premium to the person who shall discover the cause of Asiatic cholera, or the cure of that terrible disease. The money is left in trust to the Institute of France, but the Institute have made no regulations, as yet, for the presentation of essays; as the heirs of Mr. Breant are contesting, in court, the legality of this legacy. As soon as the decision of the court is declared, if in favor of the legacy, it is expected that the Institute will proclaim the regulations to be observed by competitors for this munificent prize. Until that time, all communications to the Institute, or to any other quarter, on the subject, are premature and useless. Such is the substance of a communication just received at the State Department, Washington, from our Minister in Paris, and published for the information of all interested in the matter.

German Burial-Grounds.

There are, generally speaking, a greater number of monuments in proportion, than one would find in similar places in England; the monuments and graves are constantly hung and covered over with garlands, crowns, anchors, and wreaths made of evergreens, roses, violets, everlasting, and basil, and the rare and more costly blossoms of the camellia, rhododendron, &c., and the long branches of a particular kind of palm (grown expressly for this purpose) tied with streamers of white ribbon. Many of these monuments are surrounded with iron or wooden railings, within which are comfortable chairs or garden benches, with foot-stools and watering pots for the mourners, who make periodical visits, loaded with garlands, and sit feeding their grief and watering the trees and growing flowers. The whole system is, to my mind, filled with sentimentality and bad taste. In one of these "Ruhestatte," places of rest, as it is prettily called, I found innumerable crowns of artificial flowers, silver garlands, white satin embroidered pillows, and three dozen of oranges, which formed part of the different wreaths and anchors offered up to the dead. In one part, a grave was literally studded over with glass beads like a pin-cushion, and on another was placed a small Christmas-tree, hung round with tawdry ornaments. [Lit. Gazette.

Culture of the Pie Plant.

All who have had any experience in the matter, are fully convinced of the luxury and healthfulness of fresh and succulent substances for pies at all times of the year. Yet the idea has never suggested itself to many, or if it has, it is not practiced upon, that a cycle of such substances may be had so as to furnish fresh material through the year. The pie plant furnishes a beautiful link in this connecting chain, coming, as it does, when Apples begin to lose their freshness, or as they are in many families, not to be found at all before Gooseberries, which have not yet found place in one garden of twenty to any tolerable extent. Yet how few cultivate the Pie Plant! Why, we know not, for nearly all are fond of it when properly cooked, and it can be raised as easily as the Burdock when once introduced into the soil. Neither of them will grow successfully in poor soils; the Burdock chooses a location for itself, and the Pie Plant is nearly always thrust into some poor corner of the neglected garden, and then blamed excessively if it will not produce large, fine foot stalks, where even common weeds would refuse to grow, and where no grass would vegetate, unless it be the ever intrusive Quack. We once planted some miserable, puny roots of the Pie Plant in rich deep soil. The consequence was, the next year the size of the foot stalk increased one-half. The following autumn, before the setting in of frost, we covered the bed some three or four inches deep with fresh horse manure. This kept the roots in fine preservation through the winter; and early in the spring, when the ground was fairly settled, the manure was mixed with the earth by a deep and thorough forking. No wonder that the vigor of our plants was increased in a wonderful proportion! As soon as any buds appeared they were taken off—the leaves were cut as often as they became large enough for use. The next autumn we gave the usual protection of manure, and the following spring we forked it in. This course we have followed for four years with some plants we took from neglected grass land. Now mark the result: From the miserable, puny leaves and stalks of the first year's growth, when the stalks were not more than six inches long and proportionally slender, we have now large, broad leaves, and stalks so strong that all who see them are inquiring where we got our new variety of plant, so luxuriant, strong and beautiful. The answer is conclusive; cultivation has done it; and the simple process we have followed, if pursued by others, will, on a small piece of land, and with very little labor, furnish them with an abundance of pie material at the season when, with many, there is the greatest dearth in the article. If gypsum is sown on the young leaves when the dew is on, it will push their growth finely by aiding the manure at the roots in giving them nourishment. We have no doubt but this article can be raised in the way we have adopted, so as to furnish it to cultivators at the rate of enough for a pie for half a penny. What a comfort!

The Power of Silence.

A good woman in New Jersey was sadly annoyed by a termagant neighbor, who often visited her and provoked a quarrel. She at last sought the counsel of her pastor, who added sound common-sense to his other good qualities. Having heard the story of her wrongs, he advised her to seat herself quietly in the chimney corner when next visited, take the tongs in her hand, look steadily into the fire, and whenever a hard word came from her neighbor's lips, gently snap the tongs, without uttering a word.

A day or two afterwards the good woman came again to her pastor with a bright and laughing face to communicate the effects of this new antidote for scolding. Her troubler had visited her, and, as usual, commenced her tirade. Snap, went the tongs. Another volley. Snap. Another still. Snap. "Why don't you speak?" said the termagant, more enraged. Snap. "Speak," said she. Snap. "Do speak; I shall split if you don't speak!" And away she went, cured of her malady by the magic power of silence.

It is hard work fighting a Quaker. It is poor work scolding a deaf man. It is profitless work beating the air. One-sided controversies do not last long, and generally end in victory for the silent party.

Blackberry Wine.—A correspondent of the Southern Planter writes as follows: "It may not be known to many of your subscribers, that they possess in the blackberry, grown unwillingly in their fields, the means of making an excellent wine as a valuable medicine for home use. To make a wine equal in value to port, take ripe blackberries, or dew berries, and press them; let the juice stand thirty-six hours to ferment; skim off whatever rises to the top; then to every gallon of the juice add a quart of water and three pounds of sugar, (brown sugar will do;) let this stand in open vessels for twenty-four hours; skim and strain it; then barrel it until March, when it should be carefully racked off and bottled. Blackberry cordial is made by adding one pound of white sugar to three pounds of ripe blackberries, allowing them to stand twelve hours; then pressing out the juice, straining it, adding one-third spirit, and putting a teaspoonful of finely powdered all-spice in every quart of the cordial, it is at once fit for use. This wine and cordial are very valuable medicines in the treatment of weakness of the stomach and bowels, and are especially valuable in the summer complaints of children."

A Remarkable Character.—New York possesses many remarkable characters—remarkable for very diverse reasons, but generally for their eccentricity. We have one in mind, a Madame De L. who is now probably sixty years old, and lives apparently in extreme destitution in the garret of the house she owns. She pays taxes on $14,000 of real estate and $1,000 personal property, and owns banking and railroad stock to the amount of something like $50,000. In the street, her appearance is well calculated to excite commiseration. Indeed, some kind-hearted individual, a few days ago, benevolently offered her one cent as a gratuity. The insult, however, was resented, as became her insulted honor. Diminutive in stature and decrepid, her head is covered with a hood, slouched and almost perennial. The cloak is well matched, and appears to have done good service, as the folds in the cloth are mostly worn to the warp. Her daily food consists of a shilling loaf of bread which is left at her door regularly, and there is added to this a small portion of meat, or such other food as she sees fit to obtain at the market. Even these small comforts are shared in solitude in her quiet retreat. The human face divine has no charms for her. Her property naturally descends to a nephew living in Cincinnati, and the old lady's greatest fear is that he may get it.

California Gambling.—The Maysville Herald says that recently a gambler absconded from that place, leaving behind him a roulette wheel, which, on being taken apart, was found to be so constructed, that by touching a spring, the bottom of every box painted red would be made to rise, presenting a smooth surface, and leaving the ball no alternative but to drop into the black. Should the heaviest betting be upon the black, the screw might be pressed a little harder, whereupon the bottoms of all the black boxes would come up, and the ball must go into the red. Moving with the smthooness of clock work, the machinery would never fail. With it a child might play against the world and win every game. Doubtless many a young man who has gone out from our eastern States to the land of promise, buoyant with health and energy, and has there earned by the sweat of his brow, an amount sufficient to render him independent for life, has, in a moment of excitement or forgetfulness, been induced to stake his hard earned gains at the table of a gambler, perhaps on such an instrument as this, and has thus been robbed not only of his wealth, but of his hope, his energy, and of his self-respect.

Pistol Shooting.—The N. O. Picayune, of May 4, says: The great match and bet of one thousand dollars to eight hundred, has at last been decided, Mr. Travis winning the money upon the first shot. The affair came off on May day, at the private residence of Mr. C. A. Babbitt, at Bayou Ramos, on Tiger Island, parish of St. Mary's, in this State. It being difficult to procure an apple, a small orange, only about five inches in circumference, was substituted. After the shooting distance of thirty-six feet was measured, and all parties agreed, the orange was placed by the judges, upon the head of a gentleman, a friend of both parties, Mr. J. P. O., and no object intervening, the first shot told the story, hitting the orange, half of the bullet going through. Both gentlemen displayed great nerve upon the exciting occasion. Some of the best sportsmen and acknowledged best shots in the country were present, and all express themselves fully satisfied that Mr. Travis is the best pistol shot in the world.

Important Insurance Decision.—An insurance case has been determined in the Supreme Court of New York, which settles the principle of the validity of parole contracts, voluntarily assumed by Fire Insurance Companies or their agents. The Baptist Church of Brooklyn held a policy for one year with the Brooklyn Fire Company, regularly renewed for several years, and by a verbal understanding with an officer of the Company, it was to be renewed every year, without notice, and the Treasurer or Trustee of the Church, who was always to be found in Wall-st., agreed to pay the premium when called upon. At the time of the great Brooklyn fire of 1848, the renewal had been neglected at the office for some weeks, and no renewal receipt sent to the Trustee. The church was destroyed, and now the Court holds that the parole arrangement to renew, binds the Company as fully as if the receipt had actually been passed.

The Three-Dollar Gold Coin.—An act of Congress of February, 1853, directed the coinage of three-dollar gold pieces, and specimens of this coinage having been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the coins will be immediately put in circulation. The obverse of this coin represents an ideal head, with the feathered cincture symbolic of America, the word "liberty" appearing on the band encircling the head, and the inscription "United States of America" surrounding the whole. On the reverse is a wreath composed of some of the staple productions of the United States, viz.: wheat, cotton, Indian corn, and tobacco.

Houses in the United States.—It is computed, on calculations furnished by the census returns, that 663,000 new houses have been built in the United States in the last six years, which, at an average of $1,000, would add $663,000,000 to the wealth of the country, to say nothing of the furniture necessary to the habitations; the shipping and railroads, however, would increase this amount to over $1,000,000,000. In addition to this, all the vast sums for factories, insurance companies, mines, &c., will swell the aggregate, without having made any perceptible increase in the amount of stocks held abroad.

Stone Tree.—There is a tree in Mexico called the chijol, a very fine wood, which, according to a writer in the National Intelligencer (W. C. Porter) becomes petrified after being cut, in a very few years, whether left in the open air or buried. From the timber, houses could be built that would in a few years become fire-proof, and last as long as those built of stone. The wood in a green state is easily worked; it is used in building wharves, forts, &c., and would be very good as railway sleepers, or for plank road stringers.

Elastic Horse-Shoes.—We have examined (says the N. Y. Tribune) specimens of the new Horse-Shoe invented and patented by Mr. J. O. Jones of Boston, and like the notion. The shoe is not peculiar in its external appearance, but has a piece of India Rubber inserted between the two surfaces of Steel or Sweedish Iron (the latter preferred on pavements) from either side of the heel most of the way to the toe. These give the shoe an elasticity elsewhere unknown, diminishes the force and abruptness of each concussion when the shoe strikes on rock or other solid, induces the animal to put his feet down firmly and fearlessly, prevents bruises and consequent tenderness resulting in lameness, and sometimes cures diseases of the foot already contracted. The rubber is never displaced, and the shoe is durable of itself, besides making the horse so. Such is the inventor's account of the matter, and it is backed by good certificates.

The English Language.—The following analysis of Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard, a composition which has been more extensively read, within a short period, than any other in our language, will exhibit the structure of our vernacular: Anglo Saxon, 777 words; French, 168 words; Latin, 17 words; Dutch, 12 words; German, 6 words; Greek, 4 words; Celtic, 2 words; Scandinavian, 2 words. Total, 988 words. About four-fifths of the words in the English language are monosyllabic. The doxology, "From all that dwell below the skies," contains fifty words, all but ten of which are monosyllabic. The twenty-third psalm contains one hundred and seventeen words, all but twenty-two of which are monosyllabic.

Divers' Amusements.—To lay the foundation of some new work in the Island of Alderney, divers are employed; these men, enclosed in their India-rubber armor, see strange sights at the bottom of the ocean. The fish, at first, are alarmed at the unwonted apparition, with its huge glass goggle eyes; but, soon recovering confidence, approach to satisfy themselves of the real nature of the intruder. The monster raises his hammer, which he has brought with him to quarry the rocks; the curious fish come up and inspect it; while doing so they receive a sudden knock on the head that stuns them; and when they recover their senses, they find a bit of string through their gills, and themselves prisoners tied fast to the India-rubber monster.

American Sail Duck.—Not many years ago, says the Washington Union, the whole commercial marine of the United States was dependent upon Russia for sail duck. About twenty-five years since, the manufacture of sail-cloth was commenced in Patterson, New Jersey, and such has been the increase of this branch of industry, that the Russian article has been nearly driven from the market. The whole imports of sail-cloth, of all descriptions, from Russia, would not furnish the single town of Gloucester with its canvas. More than four thousand bolts of duck are annually required at Gloucester, while the whole imports into Boston, which has nearly the entire Russian trade, during the year 1853, were about 3,000 bolts, or $38,000 worth.

VARIETY.

The deflecting needle system of telegraphing in England is vastly inferior to any of the American systems, both as regards accuracy and rapidity of communication; but so great is the prejudice in that country against everything American, that down to the present time neither the Morse nor the House system has received any countenance among the telegraph companies on the other side of the Atlantic. But it appears that one company—the Sub-marine and European Line from Liverpool to London, Dover and Calais—has at length taken measures to introduce the House Printing Telegraph instrument at all its stations, and has intrusted this duty to Messrs. B. K. Baldwin and J. N. Ashley, two experienced and accomplished operators, formerly connected with the Southern and Boston House Lines in this City.

Mr. John B. Gough has terminated his lecturing tour in Scotland, where he has been two months. For the first month, it is said, he received £250, and a very massive silver jug valued at £40, besides a number of small presents to himself and wife. For the second month he received £275, and a splendid silver tea service valued at £50, and other presents. It is estimated that his receipts for the twelve months which he is to remain in that country will not be less, but probably more, than £3,000.

It is reckoned that the British fleet, which numbered 2140 guns, fired away 45,000 lbs. of gunpowder during the battle of Trafalgar. In the action off Cape St. Vincent, one ship fired 17,730 lbs.; while upon the bombardment of Algiers, which lasted nine hours, 500 tons of shot, and nearly 118 tons of powder were expended, 28,000 lbs. of powder and 6730 shot being fired from the "Impregnable" alone.

When the French troops embarked at Toulon for Constantinople, an old man who witnessed their departure, exclaimed, in a mournful voice, "There goes my only child, to fight for a cause he does not understand, and against men with whom he never had a difference." To how many wars which history records, will the remark of this aged man apply!

Constantinople has been besieged twenty-four times—eighteen times without success. The place is one of the easiest to defend in the world, and Nicholas would find it hard work to get inside of its walls after he had reached their outside.

At Spring Creek, on the Illinois Central Railroad, 5,000 cords of wood, cut and piled up for the use of the locomotives, may be seen in one heap. The land from which it was cut was purchased by the Company for $30 per acre, and the wood is worth more than this money.

John Harper, Esq., lately left at the store of Mr. Wrightson Jones, in St. Michaels, an egg about the size of a goose egg, and when broken open it was found to contain another perfect egg about the size of an ordinary hen's egg.

Ladies who have a disposition to punish their husbands, should bear in mind, that a little warm sunshine will melt an icicle much quicker than a regular north-easter.

Never anticipate wealth from any other source than labor. He who waits for dead men's shoes may have to go a long time barefoot.

SUNDAY TRAVEL.

The Church-and-State mania, which prompted the Sunday Mail movement, some twenty-five years since, but which was so signally rebuked, and quieted for a time, by the celebrated "Sunday Mail Report," in the House of Representatives of the National Legislature, has within a few years past been revived, insidiously, and been prosecuted astutely, in different forms, to attain the same end; namely, by attempting to close the Public Works on Sunday, influence the Post-Master General and Rail Road Companies to discontinue Sunday lines, and enforcing the Sunday coërcion enactments.

The loss the Sunday advocates gained in the trial before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the case of my German brethren, in which the "Christian Sabbath" was stripped of all its "sacredness," repudiated as a "religious institution," and declared to be a mere "civil rest day," which the Legislature may, ad libitum, change to any day of the week, has led them to labor indefatigably to vamp up some better show for the festival day, by shutting up taverns, closing barber shops, and stopping omnibuses on Sunday.

Some time since, an action was instituted at Pittsburg, against an omnibus driver, for running his omnibus from that city to a suburban village, Lawrenceville, three miles distant, on Sundays, at hours to accommodate persons residing in the country who attend worship in the city, and to convey those from the city who bury their dead in the Cemetery, to enable them to visit the graves of the departed, at the only leisure they can appropriate to so sacred a purpose. The Justice of the Peace mulcted him in the usual fine. The case was carried up to the Supreme Court. A majority of the Bench (three against two) sustained the judgment of the inferior Court; but it called forth a dissenting opinion, delivered by Chief Justice Black, (Judge Lewis coinciding with him,) which deserves all commendation. Had Judges Black and Lewis been on the bench at the time when my German brethren were demanding their constitutional rights, I cannot doubt, for a moment, that the decision would have been in their favor.

The opinion of Chief Justice Black is marked, throughout, by a strong-minded, common-sense view of the subject. It is a noble production, and fully sustains his reputation as one of the very best Jurists of the State. While we have such men as Black and Lewis on the bench, the friends of Constitutional rights—immunities of conscience—religious liberty—may confidently look forward, to have their charter privileges, now trampled in the dust, restored to them ere long. Judge Black has shown himself, on former occasions, the decided friend of unfettered constitutional rights, and has, now, given us renewed assurance of his devotion to that sacred cause, in the following incomparable opinion, derived from the American Law Register, for May, 1854. W. M. F.

The Commonwealth vs. Johnston.

1. Special pleading before a Justice of the Peace, though not to be encouraged, is not unlawful, and when a defendant has pleaded specially, and the plaintiff demurs to his plea, the facts therein alledged are regularly on the record, and become substantive ground of the judgment.
2. In a conviction under the Act of 22d April, 1794, for performing worldly employment on Sunday, it should appear what the work was for which the defendant was convicted; but as the whole record is to be taken together, it is sufficient if the description of the work appear in any part of it.
3. Driving an omnibus as a public conveyance daily and every day is worldly employment, and not a work of charity or necessity within the meaning of the Act of '94, and therefore not lawful on Sunday.
4. A contract of hiring by the month does not, in general, bind the hireling to work on Sundays, and if his work be such as the Statute forbids, an express agreement to perform it on Sunday will not protect him, for such a contract is void.
5. Though traveling does not in a legal sense fall within the description of worldly employment intended to be prohibited, yet the running of public conveyances on Sunday is forbidden by the Statute. Black, Ch. J. and Lewis, J. dissenting

The following dissenting opinion was delivered by

Black, Ch. J.—The defendant, Johnston, was convicted, before an alderman, of violating the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, in "driving certain horses, to which was attached an omnibus, in which certain persons were carried over the streets of the city of Pittsburg, and from the said city over and along certain roads within the county of Allegheny."

It is important that the laws which relate to this offense should be properly administered. A general suspension of ordinary employment at regularly recurring periods, is universally admitted to have good effects on the physical, moral and pecuniary condition of the people. It is for these worldly reasons alone that the law of 1794 was made. No sane man can read the constitution and believe that the government has a right to enforce the observance of this or any other religious duty, as such.

The statute is capable of being perverted by a loose construction to purposes for which it was never intended. Being the only point of possible contact between the Church and the State, it is natural enough that some who have not fully learned the important principle of toleration, should desire to make it rub hard. Besides, it happens unfortunately that this is the very subject on which the opinions of the several sects are at the greatest variance. Some believe that that denunciations of the Old Testament against the violation of Saturday, are in full force against those who do not rest on Sunday, and that a Christian is bound to keep the latter just as a Jew did the former. Others adopt this opinion only in part; they call the first day of the week by the Jewish name for the seventh, but think that the spirit of Christianity has much mitigated the severity of the old law. A third class treat it as a weekly festival of the church, at which the resurrection of its Founder is to be solemnly celebrated, but repudiate utterly the notion that it has any connection with or analogy to, the Mosaic Sabbath. This latter party is subdivided between those who hold that the transcendently great event which the day commemorates should be honored by cessation from labor, as well as by acts of special worship, and others who maintain that their duties are fulfilled by the appropriate religious ceremonials alone. There are many persons, again, who are clear that one day is not more holy than another, who profess to have traced the origin of the contrary custom to the decree of a Roman Emperor in the third century, and who stoutly oppose themselves to all those doctrines and commandments of men, by which the original purity of the divine revelation has, in their opinion, been corrupted. Besides all these, there is another numerous and respectable Christian sect, whose exemplary moral behavior and devoted piety give their feelings a fair claim to be considered. Their doctrine is, that the fourth commandment in the decalogue was never changed nor repealed. They teach (and as far as they are permitted, they practice what they teach) that Sunday is one of the six days on which they are commanded to labor and do all their work. To them the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord their God. The universal privilege of private judgment enjoyed in this country has not only created an endless variety of opinions among Christians, but we have with us and of us still others (the Jews for instance) whose faith on this subject is neither derived from, nor in accordance with, that which is taught in the New Testament.

We are not to decide between these conflicting doctrines. The law protects them all, but adopts none as a favorite. It regards the sincere professors of every faith with equal eye, and leaves even the sin of hypocrisy to be punished by Him who alone knows the secrets of the heart. The government has no more authority on this question of observing the first day of the week than it has on the other disputes of polemic theology. It may as well attempt to make men unanimous on the duties of prayer, devout meditation, baptism, or the eucharist, as on this. It is no doubt very desirable that we should all be of one mind on subjects which interest us so deeply. But how shall such a consummation be effected? The experiment of legal force has been fully tried, and is a flat failure. The world has been governed with very little wisdom. Its political history, until we come to that of our own country, is almost an unbroken record of errors and of wrongs. But of all blunders, the most preposterous is the effort to advance religious truth by State favor; and of all tyranny, the most brutal, blind and revolting is that which punishes a man for the sincere convictions of his heart. Rulers have doubtless been impelled to do it very often by the best motives. "Malo regnum vastatum quam damnatum," said Philip V., when told that his persecutions would make the Low Countries a waste; and the English government may have only desired the salvation of the Irish, when it hanged and slaughtered them by thousands, and confiscated their property, for honestly adhering to an outlawed faith. Such benevolence produces precisely the same effect as the most malignant hatred. I admit that there is a great difference between burning a man to death at a slow fire, and compelling him to pay a fine, so small that a laborer, by diligence and self-denial, can make it up in a month. But the difference is only in degree. It was to extirpate the principle of intolerance that our constitution provided that "No human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with the rights of conscience, and no preferense shall be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship."

Those among us who believe that the institution of the Jewish Sabbath has been engrafted on the Christian system, and changed from the seventh to the first day of the week, have a right to propagate their doctrine. But they must do it by moral means—by appeals to reason and conscience—by their own example of an upright walk and conversation in life—and by charity to those who differ from them. They must get their arguments from revelation, (if they can,) not from the statute book. Religious truth asks no favor except that of its natural freedom. The absurdity of planting an oak in a hot-house is no more palpable than that of sheltering Christianity under legal enactments. It needs no forcing glass. It demands the stimulus of no artificial heat. By the power of its truth it will conquer the world; but it rejects the unworthy aid which the arm of flesh is so prone to offer. Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis.

If the act of 1794 be not construed according to the spirit of that religious liberty which the constitution guaranties, the construction must inevitably be wrong, and will lead to the worst consequences. We need not fear a union of Church and State; of that there is no danger. But the best interests of the country depend much on the reverence of the people for the religion which is taught among them. Any thing which is calculated to bring Christianity into contempt is a deep public injury. And how can that be done more effectually than by clothing it in the coarse rags of human legislation, patched up and forced on by judicial decisions? Any advantage given by law to one sect over others, is an irreparable injury to the party so favored. It will naturally be construed into an admission that it has no vital truth to sustain it. We live among a people who scorn all contrivances to fetter the mind. Statutes are necessary for some purposes, but nobody in this country believes them to be inspired. Justices of the peace and aldermen, judges, sheriffs, and constables are useful in their way, but they are not called and sent to preach any system of theology whatever. Convictions and executions, fines and imprisonment, will never be accepted as arguments, by any American, who has sense enough to know his right hand from his left. It is far better, even for the denomination we may desire to help, that every man should be fully persuaded in his own mind, and then suffered to act according to his honest convictions. Of course, if his opinions prompt him to do what is injurious to his neighbor, the law should stop him. But I hold, that the essence of republican liberty consists in this—that every citizen may do as he pleases, in regard to all those things which concern nobody but himself. And with due deference to the majority, who seem to think otherwise, I submit, that if I choose to go to church, or even to a heterodox meeting, in a three cent omnibus instead of a carriage hired for three dollars, or bought for a thousand, it is nobody's business but mine, and neither I nor the man who drives me ought to be punished for it.

These are general principles, which, up to the present time, have never been violated by this Court. I am willing to go now as far as our predecessors have ever gone. But the affirmance of this judgment takes a wide leap beyond that mark. It clears the bounds of natural justice, and leaves all precedent out of sight behind it. It fines a man for carrying decent and good citizens to religious meetings, and to other proper places, where, heretofore, it has been thought they had a right to go. It denounces as criminals, punishable by law, those men and women who go to church or visit the graves of their friends, or take the air on Sunday, and whose poverty compels them to go by the cheapest mode of conveyance. It is true that those who rode in the omnibus are not convicted; but no sophistry can make a distinction between the sin of the agent and that of the persons who employ him and participate in his acts.

Let us look more particularly into the case before us.

There were pleas, replications and demurrers filed. All this was something worse than useless. The alderman could not enroll them. A party accused may have his ground of defense stated on the record, as was done in Specht vs. The Commonwealth, 8 Barr. But the decision of a magistrate on sharp points of special pleading would be a very unsafe reliance in the execution of the law.

The evidence is also returned. Neither have we any legal right to notice it. A bill of exceptions is the only means by which evidence can be made part of the record so as to bring it before a Court of Error; and a bill of exceptions before an Alderman is as novel as a demurrer.

This case, therefore, like all others of the kind, must stand or fall by the naked record of conviction.

In these summary proceedings the magistrate acts both as judge and jury. To allow them at all is a violation of the great fundamental principle of jurisprudence, secured in England by Magna Charta, and here by the constitution, which requires that every man shall be tried by his peers. Therefore, all intendments are against such a record. Whatever does not appear on it is taken not to exist. When it leaves room for a presumption, that presumption is always in favor of innocence. The statute must be strictly pursued by the justice; "otherwise," says Burn, "the common law will break in upon him, and level all his proceedings."

The act of 1794 furnishes a form of conviction under it. If that form be followed, perhaps a particular description of the work or labor done may be omitted. This is not a case which involves that point. But when the justice does undertake to describe the act committed by the accused party, and that description shows him to be innocent, I had hoped that no court in Pennsylvania would sustain the conviction. Suppose, for instance, a man were convicted of breaking the Sabbath by preaching the gospel, or burying the dead, or nursing the sick, it ought clearly to be reversed, because it is manifest from the whole record taken together, that the magistrate's conclusion of guilt was erroneous. So, also, where the offense is set out so equivocally that it cannot be known whether the act was innocent or guilty; thus no plausible argument could be made in favor of a conviction for rapidly moving one's hands up and down on Sunday, without saying whether the defendant was pitching hay or gesticulating in the delivery of a sermon. A person may violate the Sabbath by walking from one place to another, if he were walking for a wager; but he may also walk without being guilty of any offense. A record which charges him with no more than walking, charges him with nothing.

In the case before us the alderman has very properly incorporated into his record of conviction the act which the defendant had done, so that we might review it. He gives his own judgment that the defendant is guilty, but he offers us the premises and leaves us to draw our conclusions, and say whether his was right or wrong. Let us see what it is. The defendant is accused and convicted of driving certain horses attached to an omnibus in which certain persons were carried. This is the whole head and front of his offending. Whether this was a crime or not depends on other circumstances not stated. If he was carrying the passengers to a bull-bait or a horse race, it was a scandalous violation of law and morals; but if he was taking them to a camp-meeting, or a funeral, or to some other proper place, he did no wrong, and to punish him would be an outrage on common justice. What are we to infer from a record like this? Not guilt; for the presumption of law is in favor of innocence, and the record does not contradict it. The alderman having stated the facts, we must accept them as being truly stated according to the evidence. Here, then, is a man sentenced for a criminal offense, without accusation and without proof, that either he or the persons with him, did, or intended doing, anything in the smallest degree unlawful.

Under the circumstances here disclosed, it is not only the legal, but the natural presumption, that those persons were about no guilty act, nor bent on any evil purpose. The inhabitants of Pittsburg and its environs are as moral and religious a people as any other on the globe, of equal numbers and living within similar limits. A fair man of sound judgment, (to say nothing of Christian charity,) who would see a score of unknown persons passing in or out of the city on Sunday, would take it for granted, without any aid from the rules of law, that they were not going to perpetrate any crime.

It will not do to say that this presumption of innocence is repelled by the alderman's judgment pronouncing the act an unnecessary worldly employment. This is only his judicial conclusion from the evidence. We, having before us the same materials for a judgment, are not forbidden to differ from him. If it be true that the judgment of conviction is conclusive, though against the palpable truth of the case as set out on the record, then a justice of the peace may convict a man of anything which, in his ignorance or bigotry, he may choose to call Sabbath-breaking, no matter how innocent it may be in the eye of the law. Opinions on this subject are very various among the eight or ten thousand inferior magistrates of the State. One justice would convict without hesitation for an act which others would pronounce entirely harmless. Besides, this law presents questions of real difficulty, about which the most learned lawyers have differed many a time, and will again. The citizen has no security except in having the law applied to the facts of his case by a tribunal competent to do it. But this, it seems, we must avoid for the future. Even when an alderman or justice of the peace doubts whether it is right or wrong to go to a place of public worship in an omnibus, but inclines to the latter opinion, and yet fearing that he may do injustice, puts the whole case fully and truly on the record for the purpose of having it reviewed, we can do nothing but astonish him and all who know him, by declaring his opinion infallible. If this be the true view of the subject, why should a party be mocked with a writ of error?

I think no lawyer will say, when the facts on which a summary conviction is based are set forth on the record, that they ought to be taken more strongly against the defendant than a special verdict would be in a common law indictment. And when was a special verdict like this ever sustained? Or what court of error ever listened to an argument on the proposition that the judgment of the inferior tribunal was conclusive of the defendant's guilt, when the facts, found and placed on record, proved him to be innocent?

I am of opinion that this conviction ought to be quashed, because it is on its face a conviction for nothing worse than decently passing along a public road on the first day of the week, a privilege which is and ought to be enjoyed by every man, woman and child in the commonwealth. The presumption is, that the defendant and the persons with him were going about their proper moral and religious duties. I do not believe that it is worse to ride in an omnibus than in any other vehicle, nor that a man who holds the reins and guides the horses is more wicked than they who profit by his skill. I think a coachman who takes his employer's family to church is not within the act of 1794, and I can make no distinction between that case and this.

But this case being one of a long series, and having been argued with reference to the evidence taken by the alderman, I will assume that it is all before us. A very slight examination of it will show that the record is precisely correct in the statement it furnishes of the defendant's acts. He is not charged with carrying persons over streets and roads for any improper purpose, simply because the proof was otherwise. The alderman has in this respect done his duty like an upright magistrate, and given the result of the evidence truly, without "extenuating anything or setting down aught in malice."

It appears that the defendant is an employee of a line of omnibuses which runs between Pittsburg and Lawrenceville, a town three miles distant, where the public cemetery is situated. If anything can be proved by human testimony, it is established that these omnibuses are used on the first day of the week for purposes which are not only innocent, but meritorious and praiseworthy. The inhabitants of Lawrenceville prefer a residence there for reasons of taste, economy or health. But being a mere suburb of Pittsburg, their business during the week, and their religious duties on Sunday, require most of them to be in the city. The convenience of an omnibus line to carry them and their families to church was a motive which is proved to have influenced at least some of them, in the selection of that place. Without this mode of conveyance, there are great numbers who would be wholly deprived of all ecclesiastical communion with the people of their own faith; for they have no churches or meeting-houses nearer home than Pittsburg, they are not able to keep carriages, and the roads are generally in a condition which makes traveling on foot difficult for anybody, and impossible for women, children and persons of infirm health. The use of the omnibuses by these persons and by others who go to visit the graves of their friends, and by some who leave the smoke of the city to breathe for a brief space a purer atmosphere in the woods and fields, constitutes the full sum of the immoralities complained of. This is proved by the testimony of a dozen most unimpeachable witnesses, all of whom are called by the informer himself.

The whole business is conducted with the utmost propriety. One person only testifies that on a single occasion, long ago, he had heard swearing in an omnibus. The proof is full that all disorderly persons were turned and kept out. It is certainly not improbable that among the many persons who use this conveyance for such purposes as I have mentioned, an occasional sinner in disguise may have been admitted, and used it for traveling on worldly or unlawful, and, for aught I can say, criminal business. But, surely it is better that a wicked man should be left to the punishment which will in time overtake him, than that the innocent should suffer for his offense. The agent of the line swears that the vehicles are run on Sundays with special reference to the hours at which the religious congregations assemble and dismiss, and not either as often or at the same times as on other days.

Notwithstanding the necessity thus existing for a line of cheap conveyances to carry the people back and forth between Lawrenceville and Pittsburg, all the drivers were prosecuted, as if they had been detected in the perpetration of some great enormity. When the prosecutions failed with one alderman, they were renewed before another. What motive prompted the effort to deprive the people of Lawrenceville of the means which had been previously at their command, of worshiping God in the way their consciences told them was right, I do not pretend to judge. But whether it be done by infidels to injure the Christian congregations generally, or by bigots of one church to break down another, it is equally a perversion of the law and of the gospel. If any portion of our people hold the privilege of going to church in an omnibus, when that is their only means of getting there, at the mercy of every profane scoffer or blinded sectary who chooses to make an information, then freedom of conscience is in a worse condition than I thought it was.

It may be answered, that though it was proper enough for the passengers to go to church or to the cemetery, or into the country for health and recreation, the defendant himself was engaged in his ordinary calling, and therefore is guilty. This mode of putting the case is very superficial, to say the least of it. When it is proper for one man to do an act which he cannot accomplish without assistance, another may aid him. A person charged with doing worldly employment on Sunday, may plead his neighbor's need for it as well as his own. The fact that he does it for hire, makes no difference. A calling, profession or trade may be exercised on the first day of the week for money, if the public welfare or private necessity demands it. Thus the apothecary sells drugs on that day, the physician attends the sick, the undertaker buries the dead, the sexton opens the church—all in pursuit of the business by which they earn their bread—and they justify their conduct, because it is necessary, not to themselves, but to their customers.

If, therefore, it be lawful for men to go and come to church and elsewhere on the first day of the week, he who bears them over the mud or snow is as innocent as they are. In ministering to their necessities he brings himself within the exception of the statute, as clearly as if his own safety or convenience depended upon it. The half dime which his customers pay him for carrying them to the church, is no greater sin than the contribution expected from them when they get there to the preacher's salary.

The very point was ruled by the Court in Logan vs. Matthews, 6 Barr, 417, that what a man may lawfully do by himself, he can do by the assistance of another. The keeper of a livery stable, in the exercise of his ordinary business, hired a horse on Sunday to a person who used to visit his father. The contract was declared to be lawful. And why? Because there was nothing in the law to hinder or forbid such a visit. Since no law hinders men from going to church or visiting a burying-ground, or taking the air, it is lawful, on the principle of the case referred to, for an omnibus driver to furnish them the means of doing so.

I give to the word necessity the broadest definition. Nothing is necessary which is not indispensable. But different things may be necessary as means to different ends; one thing is necessary to life, another to health, another to decency, another to comfort, another to intellectual improvement, another to moral culture, another to spiritual progress; and all these ends being lawful, whatever is necessary to effect either of them, is a necessity within the meaning of the law. To the health, comfort and decency; to the moral, mental and religious improvement of these people, a cheap, rapid and ever ready mode of conveyance is an absolute necessity. To compel them to remain imprisoned within their houses on Sunday, is odious tyranny. To allow them to go out only on condition that they trudge through the mud and endure the rains, is absurd, as well as cruel. What would be thought of an order to close the bridges and tie up the boats, lest the people of Allegheny should commit the sin of going to church dry, instead of swimming across the river?

Numerous omnibuses, hacks and carriages, running through a populous city, may become a nuisance. When this is the case the local authorities may properly regulate them, or stop them altogether. But of this the people themselves are the best judges. The city authorities, representing the people, have not thought proper to do so in Pittsburg.

In Jones vs. Hughes (5 S. & R. 299,) it was held that traveling was not within the act of 1794. The correctness of this decision has never been questioned. All the legislation of the Commonwealth has proceeded on the principle then established. The State government carries passengers over her own canals and railways every Sunday, and regularly provides by law the means of doing so, keeping for that purpose officers, agents and laborers in her constant employ. There is more walking and riding done on the first day of the week than any other. Persons who cannot go out at any other time, go then. The whole population is in motion. Not one in ten thousand thinks it his duty to keep within doors, and perhaps no man in the Commonwealth is so completely saturated with bigotry, that he would prevent people from moving about from place to place, if he could. The worst that malice itself can allege against those who rode in an omnibus, No. 11, on the 1st of September, is, that they were going where they pleased in a decent and orderly manner, and for purposes of which the propriety and lawfulness have not been questioned. What the driver did, was to furnish them with the necessary means of doing so. If the authority of Logan vs. Matthews is not to be overturned, and common sense upset along with it, the driver and passengers were alike innocent of every offense, except, perhaps, that of patronizing the wrong church.

DEATH OF MOZART.

There is something beautiful and touching in the circumstances of his death. "His sweetest song was the last he sung"—the "Requiem." He had been employed upon this exquisite piece for several weeks—his soul filled with inspirations of the richest of melody, and already claiming kindred with immortality. After giving it its last touch, and breathing into it that undying spirit of song which was to consecrate it through all time, as his "cygnean strain," he fell into a gentle and quiet slumber. At length, the light footsteps of his daughter Emilie awoke him. "Come hither," said he, "my Emilie—my task is done—the Requiem—my Requiem is finished." "Say not so, dear father," said the gentle girl, interrupting him, as tears stood in her eyes; "you must be better—you look better, for even now your cheek has a glow upon it. I am sure we will nurse you well again—let me bring you something refreshing." "Do not deceive yourself, my love," said the dying father; "this wasted form can never be restored by human aid. From Heaven's mercy alone do I look for aid, in this my dying hour. You spoke of refreshment, my Emilie—take these, my last notes—sit down by my piano here—sing them with the hymn of thy sainted mother—let me once more hear those tones which have been so long my solacement and delight." Emilie obeyed; and with a voice enriched with tenderest emotion, sung the following stanzas:

"Spirit! thy labor is o'er!
  Thy term of probation is run,
Thy steps are now bound for the untrodden shore,
  And the race of immortals begun.

Spirit! look not on the strife
  Or the pleasures of earth with reget—
Pause not on the threshhold of limitless life,
  To mourn for the day that is set.

Spirit! no fetters can bind,
  No wicked have power to molest;
There the weary, like thee—the wretched shall find
  A haven—a mansion of rest.

Spirit! how bright is the road
  For which thou art now on the wing?
Thy home it will be with thy Saviour and God,
  Their loud hallelujahs to sing"

THE CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.

Rev. Mr. Speer, Missionary among the Chinese in San Francisco, says:—

"The Chinese are much stimulated to improvement by their residence in this country. Several have taken out the papers necessary to becoming citizens in due time. Many admire our institutions, and imitate some of our customs. Our own people regard the mission with favor. A deep interest is felt in the prospective commerce with China; when this city and Shanghae shall have been linked together by steam, and this port be the point of connection between the old and new world, and also in that wonderful revolution which is breaking down the ancient barriers of the East, and opening it to civilization and Christianity.

"On the other hand, I feel that my labors among the Chinese have not been so abundant, faithful, and prayerful, as they should have been; and how far my own heart has been from realizing their dreadful condition as idolators and guilty sinners going down to everlasting punishment. In their temporal condition there is much to mourn. They are given to gambling almost universally, and their tables are encouraged by the sanction of a municipal license (at $50 per month for each table.) Hundreds of the most infamous females are imported hither from the boats upon the Canton river, where they are purchased by the head by Chinese speculators, and brought here to pollute our mining population and their own people. The men working in the mines have often been treated in the most barbarous manner by the whites of various nations; many having been shot down like brutes, and the offenders allowed to go unpunished by our laws. Their effeminate frames have often sunk under the hardships of mountain toil, miserable food, and insufficient shelter. They enjoy unhindered indulgence in the intoxicating drug, which has poisoned many thousands of their countrymen; and not a few amidst their calamities have used opium to destroy their wretched existence. As a people, the Chinese here are in many respects to be deeply pitied." May the sympathies of Christians be drawn out toward them; and to each church, and to each pastor, where this report shall be read in our missionary paper, may we not send from this new and important field, the sincere and anxious request, that in their prayers mention may often be made of the heathen whom God is bringing for instruction and knowledge of salvation to the shores of our own enlightened and Christian land."

EXPLANATION OF DANIEL.—How strinkingly does the last discovery of Colonel Rawlinson explain the meaning of the promise made by Belshazzar to the wise men, and also to Daniel, that he that should interpret the handwriting on the wall should be made "third ruler in the kingdom." Matthew Henry explains this as meaning that he should be next to the king, and the heir apparent. But even this supposition was liable to contradiction. Why was he not, like Joseph, made next in rank to the king? But the whole matter is now made clear by the recent discovery of the JOINT reign of Nabonidas and Belshazzar. How emphatically might Daniel be proclaimed "THIRD ruler in the kingdom." Truly there is no wisdom nor knowledge against the Lord. [Edin. Witness.

Speaking of the goods of life, Sir William Temple says: "The greatest pleasure of life is love; the greatest treasure is contentment; the greatest possession is health; the greatest ease is sleep; and the greatest medicine is a true friend."

THE GOSPEL HID FROM UNBELIEVERS.

Though it was Paul's care to preach the Gospel, "not with wisdom of words, lest the Cross of Christ should be made of no effect," we are not to suppose that his preaching was destitute of real wisdom. And though he speaks of the Gospel as the "foolishness of God," we are not to suppose that a foolish thought, in any strict sense of the term, ever escaped his lips. His meaning is perfectly obvious. The Gospel is a scheme above the comprehension of the unrenewed man. "The natural man discerneth not the things which be of the spirit; they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." All who are not taught by the Spirit of God, are lacking in discernment of the adaptation of the Gospel to the end which it proposes to accomplish; hence, they think it foolishness. It proposes to cleanse the sinner from his guilt, and to present him to God in a justified state. It proposes to break up the love of sin in his heart, to purify him from all iniquity, and to make him fruitful in good works. But the unrenewed man can see nothing in the Gospel which is adapted to such results. In the story of Christ crucified for our sins—in the doctrine of his death as an atoning sacrifice—in the doctrine of salvation by grace instead of works—in the doctrine of justification solely by the merits of our Redeemer, without regard to our own righteousness, the unrenewed man sees nothing which is calculated to awaken a sense of responsibility, and arouse the sinner to reformation.

It is true, as far as the Gospel consists of mere natural precepts, or as far as it enforces the natural law of righteousness under sanctions which appeal to our fears, and even as far as this law is commended by the example and heroic martyrdom of a man so good and holy as Jesus was, natural men are willing to admit that it is according to wisdom. Hence, those errorists who reject the doctrine of Atonement, preaching Jesus as an example of conformity to moral rectitude merely, and urging obedience without any reference to the great Propitiation, have no difficulty in finding disciples among the wise of this world. But what they preach is not the Gospel. For though the Gospel enforces the Law, or (to speak more properly) is a power which promotes conformity to the Law, it is not the Law itself. Though moral precepts are scattered all through the New Testament, they are not (strictly speaking) the Gospel, nor (considered merely as moral precepts) even a part of it. And though these moral precepts are commended by the example of Christ, yet (considered in this light merely) they are not a part of the Gospel.

This may appear strange language to many, but we insist on our position. The term gospel means simply good news. The Gospel is good news—glad tidings of great joy—because, in virtue of the great Atonement which it sets forth, and in virtue of the Holy Spirit which it produces, it becomes a power by which the sinner is raised from his fallen condition into a state of justification before God, and by which he cleanses himself from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting himself in holiness. Hence, it is beautifully and truly described as the POWER OF GOD. Rom. 1: 16. Take away the Atonement, and take away the Holy Spirit which the Atonement secures to believers, and the Gospel is as powerless to save as the Law. It is no longer the Gospel, for it can be no longer good news.

In an extended sense, we often speak of the Gospel as a system which embraces moral precepts, as well as the great doctrine of atonement. But even in this extended sense, moral precepts are not part and parcel of the Gospel, except so far as they are enforced, sanctioned, and commended by the death of Christ considered as a propitiatory offering for our sins. In any other point of view, they are not entitled to be considered as gospel precepts. Considered as enforced by the example of Jesus merely, whether this example be in his life, or in his death simply as martyrdom to a good cause, they are not gospel precepts. For even when thus enforced, they do not constitute the power by which the sinner is emancipated from his condemned state, and brought into justification with God. They are but precepts of law, after all, and have no more power to save, than such precepts had when enforced by the examples and martyrdom of the ancient prophets.

Now, as all the power of the Gospel centers in the Atonement, and in the accompanying work of the Holy Spirit; and as the Gospel proposes to accomplish the salvation of the sinner by that power which is peculiarly its own, rejecting all extraneous aids; it is counted by the natural man as a system of foolishness. He does not believe that God has been so foolish as to give such a system to the world, and therefore either rejects the Bible as not being a revelation from the infinitely wise God, or else labors, by torturing its language, to make it declare some other doctrine. He does not believe that those who preach this doctrine are true messengers, and laughs at their preaching, as not adapted to the end proposed. He laughs, and disbelieves, because he is blind—because spiritual things are foolishness to him—because they are above his comprehension—because the Gospel is a mystery hid from the wise and prudent, and is wisdom only to those who by the Holy Spirit are made to see its perfection. "If our gospel be hid, it is hid from them that are lost."

THE EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association held its 18th annual meeting with the church at Greenmanville, Ct., commencing on Fifth-day, May 25th, and closing on the following First-day.

The Introductory Discourse was preached by Joel Greene, from Prov. 11: 30—"He that winneth souls is wise." P. L. Berry served as Moderator, and Geo. B. Utter and W. B. Gillett as Recording Secretaries. Letters were received from all of the churches connected with the Association except Berlin, and delegates were present from nearly every church. The Western Association was represented by Leman Andrus.

The afternoon of Fifth-day was mostly occupied in reading the letters from the churches, the report of the delegate to the Central and Western Associations, an essay by H. H. Baker on the method of conducting Sabbath-Schools, the reports of the Executive Board, the Treasurer, &c. From the Report on the State of Religion, printed herewith, some idea may be gathered of the condition of the churches, as represented in their letters. The essay on Sabbath-Schools will appear in the Recorder at an early day. The report of the Executive Board showed that but little had been done during the past year, except to supply the South Kingston Church with preaching half of the time.

The morning session of Sixth-day was given to a public examination of Ethan P. Larkin, with reference to his ordination to the work of the gospel ministry, in compliance with a request of the New York Church. The examination proved satisfactory, and the ordination took place on First-day.

The afternoon session of Sixth-day was occupied in receiving and acting upon the reports of Standing Committees, and the appointment of delegates to sister Associations. S. S. Griswold was appointed delegate to the Central Association, A. B. Burdick to the Western Association, and Geo. H. Perry co-delegate to both those Associations; C. M. Lewis to the North-Western Association, and W. B. Gillett to the Virginia and Ohio Associations.

The business sessions of First-day were mostly taken up in discussing a series of resolutions introduced by the Business Committee. Those adopted by the Association will be found below.

In the way of preaching, there was no lack. Charles M. Lewis preached in the evening following Fifth-day, E. P. Larkin in the evening following Sixth-day, James Bailey on Sabbath morning, Leman Andrus on Sabbath afternoon, and Lucius Crandall on First-day morning, previous to the ordination. The evening after the Sabbath there was a general conference meeting.

Late in the afternoon of First-day, the Association adjourned, to meet at Pawcatuck, R. I., on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in May, 1855, when W. B. Gillett is to preach the Introductory Discourse; James Bailey alternate.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion report: That from a careful consideration of the subject, they find some marked evidences of a more healthy and advancing state of religion among the churches. The Committee refer to the report of revivals, of improvement in discipline, the settlement of difficulties, the flourishing state of Sabbath Schools, the increased contributions for benevolent operations, the great harmony and peace which pervades the Association, and the apparently higher standard of Christian action which is manifest. All these are indications for good, and speak much for our religious prosperity. While we hail these as evidences of religious interest, we feel that some of them often amount to but little in the end; for, painful as it is, fidelity requires that it should not be disguised, that many are the defections from the hopeful converts of modern revivals; and your Committee would seriously call the attention of this body to a prayerful consideration and inquiry concerning the cause of such defections; and would also respectfully suggest, a more direct application of gospel truth to the removal of the varied forms sin assumes in the present day. As the antagonism of all wrong, Christianity must be aggressive in its movements; and so much has the light dawned in this day, that ignorance cannot be urged as a plea for not applying truth in its most appropriate way. While we rejoice at the apparent signs of increasing prosperity in the Association, we would stir up the mind by way of remembrance and Christian counsel.

The following extracts from the letters of the churches, will serve to show their own estimate of their condition:—

Newport, R. I.—Since the removal of Eld. Lewis, we have been entirely destitute of the preached word, with few exceptions; the result of which is obvious and natural, we being only a remnant, weak and small, existing in broken fragments of our ancient and for a long time flourishing Zion. Our meetings have been very irregular, and almost entirely without the ordinances of the gospel, yet we feel an individual responsibility to act our part on the stage of life.

Piscataway, N. J.—During the past year, we have been highly favored. The Lord hath visited us by the outpouring of his Spirit, and turning many from their evil ways to love and obey him; and we have been led to exclaim, "Bless the Lord for his goodness." We have enjoyed a good degree of religious and Christian feeling in the Church. Our meetings for prayer and conference are well attended.

1st Hopkinton, R. I.—We have enjoyed a revival of religion during the year, and quite number of the youth have been hopefully converted and gathered into the church, while the hearts of God's people have been made to rejoice. Our meetings for worship, and especially on the Sabbath, are well attended, and a firm determination seems to prevail, to be thorough in the discipline of the church.

Shiloh, N. J.—We have great reason to bless God, that he has favored us with general prosperity, in that some precious souls have been born into the kingdom, and that many have felt the necessity of a closer walk with God. Our Sabbath morning service is well attended. We have sustained prayer meetings weekly, and our young brethren and sisters meet weekly for conference and prayer. We have a Bible-class, conducted by our pastor, and a Sabbath-School of one hundred scholars.

Waterford, Ct.—We have not enjoyed, the past year, the labors of a pastor. All our meetings have been well attended, and a good degree of religious interest manifested; but we feel that in promoting the welfare of Zion, and the progress of the true reforms of the day, we ought to bave more zeal and attachment.

Marlborough, N. J.—Death has been permitted to call from our number some with whom we were wont to take delight. But on the other hand we have had cause to rejoice at the outpouring of the Spirit of God during the winter, by which the wandering have been reclaimed, saints encouraged, and sinners converted.

2d Hopkinton, R. I.—Our prospects at the present time are more flattering, having secured the labors of Eld. Daniel Coon for the coming year, if the Lord permit. Our congregation looks like days of old, when the people were glad to go up to the house of the Lord. We enjoy perfect harmony as a church.

3d Hopkinton, R. I.—It is not our happiness to tell you of large success in the ingathering of souls the past year; but we find a pleasure in saying, that we retain a sense of our obligations to be faithful to God, and our pledged vows. The pastoral relation existing between Eld. Joel Greene and this church is about to be dissolved, which will take effect at the closing of this Association. The resignation is contrary to our anticipations and hopes, and leaves us destitute of an under shepherd.

Petersburgh, N. Y.—We have nothing of a very encouraging nature to write in our annual epistle, yet we have abundant reason to be thankful that the Lord has not entirely left us. We trust that with most of the members of our church, a good degree of union and Christian fellowship prevails; yet we are sorry to say, that in a few instances, where peace and love ought to prevail, an opposite state of things is too apparent.

Westerly, R. I.—Our Sabbath meetings have been quite well attended the most part of the time, and there still seems to be a disposition on the part of some to struggle on, until victory shall turn on Zion's side.

Plainfield, N. J.—When we last addressed you, we were destitute of a pastor. In September, Eld. James Bailey accepted the charge of the church. At the commencement of the year, we held a series of evening meetings, and the Lord visited us in mercy.

Pawcatuck. R. I.—In regard to our spiritual standing, we have nothing unusually cheering to communicate, being conscious that to too great an extent we have come short of that degree of Christian perfection which we believe it to be the privilege and duty of every Christian to arrive at. But we have from time to time found it to be refreshing to wait upon the Lord in his sanctuary as well as in the discharge of other duties.

New York.—Although meetings on the Sabbath have been regularly maintained, and tolerably well attended, no special refreshing from the presence of the Lord has been experienced. Bro. T. B. Brown, who has served the church as pastor since its organization in 1845, resigned that office in April, 1854; and the church is at present without a pastor.

Greenmanville, Ct.—We believe that it is our leading aim to possess that religion which will visit the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions, and keep itself unspotted from the world. We feel desirous to give to the world the only true evidence of real Christianity, viz., "Love to God and love to man," universal.

South Kingston, R. I.—We feel thankful for the assistance rendered to build us a house of worship, and still we feel somewhat embarrassed with the debt that hangs upon us. We appreciate the labors of Bro. Clarke, under your direction, and do earnestly pray that he, or some other one, may continue to break to us the bread of life, hoping that such labors may not be in vain in the Lord.

The Resolutions.

1. Resolved, That this Association recommends to the Board of the Publishing Society vigorously to prosecute to completion the arrangement to secure a Publishing House in New York.

2. Resolved, That we recommend that the Executive Board of this Association estimate the expenses of our missionary operations for the coming year, and apportion the same among the churches; and we further recommend, that the churches respond at once to the Board, whether they will sustain the apportionment.

3. Resolved, That this Association authorizes its committee on the Newport Church property to co-operate with the committee of that Church for the purpose of relieving their property from incumbrance by a lease held by the Fourth Baptist Church.

4. Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association, the holding, selling, or purchasing of human beings, except for the direct object of securing the freedom of such persons, is in itself a sin against God, and a high crime against man.

5. Resolved, That this Association continues to view with unabated and unmitigated abhorrence the system of American Slavery; and that it laments the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, and the passage in 1854 of what is commonly called the Nebraska Bill, by which a large territory once sacred to freedom is thrown open to slavery.

6. Resolved, That this Association considers aggressive war inconsistent with the gospel of Christ, and advises its members in no way to give it their influence or sanction.

7. Resolved, That for the next meeting of the Association, Lucius Crandall be requested to prepare an essay on the New Testament organization and discipline of a church; Geo. B. Utter an essay on the method of securing an able and efficient ministry; James Bailey an essay on partnerships between Sabbath-keepers and First-day-keepers, in which business is conducted on the Sabbath; H. H. Baker an essay on the use of Tobacco; and S. S. Griswold an essay on the nature and influence of American Slavery.

THE WANTS OF CHINA.—In a letter from Mr. Johnson, dated Hong Kong, Jan. 25, he states that the "Cassina" brought from Nanking, with other books, a copy of the Gospel of Matthew. "It is the old version of Medhurst and Gützlaff, with a few verbal alterations. They are going to print the whole New Testament, Taiping Wang himself superintending the publication, all the copies to bear on the title page his imprimatur. So that it is not Bibles and tracts that we especially need to meet this emergency, but men. Oh! that the churches could be made to feel this!"

SECRET SOCIETIES.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In the 48th and 49th numbers of the 10th volume of the Sabbath Recorder, is an article on Secret Societies. I regret its publication, as great injustice is done to the members. As a member, I feel compelled to enter my protest against the sentiment, as well as the spirit, of the communication. Jealousy is the foundation of this opposition to Secret Societies—the same spirit that tempted the disciples, when they complained to our Saviour saying, "We found one casting out devils, and we forbade him, because he followed not us." But Christ said to them, "Forbid him not." So I say, Let them do all the good they can; if they do evil, protest against the evil. I find this disposition still in the world, of finding fault and persecuting all that will not follow them.

I regret, as much as any person, the necessity of any organization except the Church, for the reformation of the world; but with all our churches, drunkenness and poverty have continued for near six thousand years, and the prospects were anything but flattering, until other efforts were made. These efforts have all been opposed, and will be, by some good men. The opposition to Secret Societies, I am fully satisfied, is caused by ignorance or superstition. I was taught to oppose them, and did so, until about four years since, I became intimately acquainted with the members of the Order of the Sons of Temperance. Through the influence of several members of the Baptist and Methodist Churches, I became a member of the order, and am now a member of the Grand Division of Western New York; also a member of the order of Good Templars. Of these I can speak from experience. That the charges alledged are not true in regard to the Order of Odd Fellows, I am fully satisfied from intimate acquaintance with many of its members, who are worthy members of the Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches.

I ask, Does our connection with these Societies render us less useful in the church or the world? If it does, admonish us for that defect—say wherein—and not complain of us because we are trying to do more than you. If you can devise more efficient means to advance the cause of temperance or benevolence, bring them forward; we will not oppose you, but will cheerfully lend a helping hand. Our object is to benefit the human family. We will not hinder you, even if you will not follow us.

I am fully satisfied that the charge of trying to climb up some other way to heaven, than by Jesus Christ, does not apply to us. We fully believe the church is wanting in action in the cause of temperance, and in providing for the poor and the sick. We believe that God would approve of this, more than so much effort to raise the salaries of ministers; not but what they should be liberally supported, if they spend their time and talents in the spread of the gospel, but they should urge the church to take care of the poor, instead of sending them to the poor-house, to suffer and die like the brutes. LUKE P. BABCOCK.

HOMER, N. Y., May 19, 1854.

LETTER FROM PALESTINE.

PLAINS OF SHARON, March 22, 1854.

Through the preserving care of our Heavenly Father, the members of our little colony are all, at present, enjoying good health, notwithstanding our labors and responsibilities have been considerably increased since my last letter. Through an occasional paper from the United States we hear of the war with Russia, but we have experienced no change or disturbance in our affairs whatever; neither do intelligent foreign residents apprehend any molestation, so far as we can learn. Resident consuls of different nations pass and re-pass on tours of pleasure or business. Shipping merchants (French, Italians, and Greeks) are buying grain and prosecuting their affairs as usual. Missionaries pursue their various duties at Lebanon Beirout, Jerusalem, and Jaffa, as before. While there are not so many pilgrims from surrounding countries, and bordering on Russia, as usual, European and American travelers are exploring in every direction, and coming across the Great Desert as usual. As many as twenty Americans, we hear, are this week in Jerusalem. A few only have called on us, as we are situated some miles from the general route.

We have not heard of any resident leaving the country on account of the war, except the Russian consul, who left quietly some months since. Last autumn we heard of a few cases of dissatisfaction in the interior among the Bedouins, with each other, and the government taxes, which resulted in mutual skirmishes, stealing of horses and cattle, &c. But the government sending a few soldiers, and the recent arrival of a new Pasha from Constantinople, whom the Arabs say has threatened to take off the head of every offender, has at once suppressed these troubles. For ourselves, we feel more safety here than we did at home, where we were liable, within the safest bolts, to have the midnight robber take not only our light valuables, but our life also, and where we were never, as here, secure from the alarm and danger of fire, which, in the United States, as we learn from the newspapers, has wasted millions the last year! Here we have not heard of a door being broken, or of life being endangered, by the miserable natives who pilfer for nakedness and hunger; the open and insecure dwellings, and want of good fences, being the greatest difficulty. A number of the principal Turks in Jaffa visit us familiarly with their families, and assure us of their friendship and protection. A late Governor offers us his town-house, in case of any disturbance in the country. The poor Arabs and Fellaheen of the villages near us, are also very friendly, and we are gaining quite an influence among them, from the good effects they daily receive from our little dispensary. The Jews show increased confidence in our object, and the young men in our employ have become attached, like affectionate children, to us—they have greatly improved, and are beginning to be very useful to the work. It is a sweet reward to our toil, to see their cheerful, ruddy faces, and hear their hearty laugh, while ambitiously engaged at work, so great a reverse from their pale dejected looks, and actions, at their first coming to us. We have now four places of labor and effort.

In Jaffa, the school of sister Williams, for Jewish girls, in the house of the Chief Rabbi (with sister N. for assistant) steadily improves. About a mile and a half north of Jaffa, in sight of our house, brother Dickson and family reside, who, with his son, have finished an addition to their house, and repaired the high walls, inclosing a large area round the house, stabling, and well; vigorously breaking and laying stone, from a ledge at a short distance, for that purpose. They are now putting in their spring crop of potatoes, and arranging their garden for summer. After meeting last Sabbath, which principally consists of reading the Scriptures, singing, and special prayer for the direction and blessing of the Lord upon our work, he expressed himself highly satisfied with his position, and greatly encouraged by the prospect of usefulness widening around us. Next is the house in which we and our Jews reside, our first foothold here, leased the middle of last May, which lease we expect to renew soon; also, our fruit and vegetable garden, mulberry orchard, and small wheat field, joining brother Dickson's, which we leased in June, and have since labored upon. We had three measures of wheat sown last November (about one and a half bushels,) on rich soil, well prepared by an American plough. Its appearance thus far is the finest, the Arabs say, that they have ever seen. It is very rank, of a dark green, and began to head last month. Its excellence, no doubt, is on account of deep ploughing, which cannot be accomplished by the miserable Arab plough. We have half an acre of horse beans, now yielding early and well, which the Arabs so much prize, that citizens come out for them from Jaffa, and give three piastres per rottle (six and a half pounds.) Our winter beets, ruta baga turnips, and peas, have done very well. We have a fine crop of the former ready for the Jews at their Passover, when they particularly prize and need them.

Our next and last place, which we have recently commenced cultivating, is situated nearly a mile and a half further north, near the sea. An account of this place, in somewhat tedious detail, is perhaps necessary, that you and the friends of Israel may understand why we have ventured to undertake so much; also, the necessity and precise state of our work.

In our letters we have repeatedly mentioned to you our friend the Chief Rabbi of Jaffa. That he is interested in our object, and in the cultivation of this land—that, in connection with a Rabbi of Jerusalem, six years since, he purchased a wild piece of land (about twenty acres) very low, and has since cultivated a large Biarrah (or watered fruit orchard) upon it with success. It is so far from the orange plantations, immediately surrounding Jaffa, in the vicinity of wilder Arabs, their villages, and wandering shepherds, that it has not been safe for him to employ his poor brethren upon it; but himself and friends visiting it by day, and returning by night, and leaving its principal care with an Arab gardener. When the Jews are laboring in connection with us, they are respected as being under American protection, and they seldom suffer any indignity from the Arabs. As watering is expensive, and he has been obliged to depend on Arabs, he has spent much and received little, although his trees are beginning to bear well. Through his gardener's want of care, his three good mules for drawing water have all died the last season; he has become reduced in means, and is unable to replace them, or continue the cultivation of his Biarrah, on which account it must soon perish, and be destroyed by Arab flocks. Since we came to Jaffa, he has repeatedly urged us to take his garden under our care, upon any terms; but on account of our previous engagements and limited means, we could only encourage him to hope for aid from American Christians, to whom we repeatedly stated his case, being most unwilling to have him fail in his cherished hope, of preparing there a home for himself and children, in the approaching "better day" that he anticipates. He frequently inquired if we had received any encouragement from our friends for him, while we still sustained his hope, trusting that God would surely send him aid. He is generally esteemed as a worthy man; he is aged, and although procurator for the Jews in Jaffa, he is very poor. He has won our sincere regard, through his kind, judicious decisions in cases of variance and difficulty among the poor Jews, to whom he is a father and judge. Again and again we encouraged him, while our hearts were sad at the long delay, until, late in February, one day he came, as usual, (two principal men were with him,) in great distress, and informed us that his gardener had run away, and that the Arab shepherds had commenced breaking the hedge and pasturing their herds among his choicest fruit trees. He exclaimed, "I have not a piastre to spare from my children to save it! All is lost; All my expense and labor for six years are gone! I have no hope but in God and you! I give the entire premises to you; it is yours; if you do not save it, it will be immediately destroyed." He was pale and trembling with emotion, and waited our reply. Though we knew too well our poverty and weakness, we begged him to take courage, and we would consider what could be done, and he left us somewhat comforted. Afterwards, when brother Dickson and family, the German brethren, and all were gathered, we laid his case before them, and offered all we could spare of means and aid to any one that woutd undertake the care of his garden. Our own hands were full; many sick coming from a distance to us, sores to be daily dressed, our own gardens almost ready to change crops in preparation for summer, but most of all, our destitution of sufficient means. Our Jews could do nothing alone, and it seemed an impossibility for us to undertake it. Our Arab consul had desired us not to extend further from Jaffa, but to occupy a piece of rich soil near the city of his own. All present deeply sympathized with our Jewish friend, but declared that they were more than occupied, and, like ourselves, had no means to spare, and would not attempt what they could not accomplish! While we were still anxiously considering what could be done, sister Shuler volunteered to take Abdallah (who has courage and influence among the Arabs) and go and watch the Biarrah until something might be done. So one whole rainy week, with her donkey and lunch, she went and returned each day. One of our German neighbors went also a few days with her to encourage her. Abdallah would have been unwilling to have undertaken the task without one of us, so that he could show the Arabs that the Americans had taken the garden, and they must not dare to trespass any more. The first morning, flock after flock drove in, until Abdallah shouted at them, and gave them the above information, when they all quietly dispersed.

We had written to friends in New York, from whom we hoped for aid for him, but soon after we received intelligence that those that had anticipated assisting him, were hindered from fulfilling their purpose, and therefore his garden must perish meanwhile. It would be of little use to watch it, the season was growing late, all the soil beneath the closely planted bushy trees (which cannot be ploughed) must be well digged with a mattock, and the channels made for watering, (this must be done once every year,) this labor only would take ten laborers a month, with careful attention, provisions, pruning, &c. This would cost one thousand piastres. Three mules, worth one thousand piastres each, must be purchased, and be well fed, hedges repaired, a crop planted, &c., which in all, would need more money than we possessed! All this we had to consider. We knew that Jews in Jerusalem had knowledge of this Rabbi's garden, also others in Europe, also of our proximity, and professed love and care for Jewish cultivation here, and it seemed that the success of our whole work was at stake. After much prayer, and venturing to perish in the attempt, we resolved to commence, and trust in God to aid us in rescuing this truly first effort of the Jews themselves to cultivate this land!

I will add further statements in another letter. Yours, &c. M.

GOV. SEYMOUR'S VETO MESSAGE.

At a meeting of members of the New York Legislature who voted for the bill entitled "An Act for the Suppression of Intemperance," held on the evening of April 4, a committee of three Senators and four Assembly-men was appointed, by whom a review of Gov. Seymour's Veto Message has been prepared and published, demonstrating that the objections urged by him to the bill presented for his signature have no foundation in constitutional law, or fact. The final paragraph of the document is as follows:—

> In conclusion, we ask—What will the friends of this great measure of reform do? Will they be discouraged by a single failure? Will they yield now when success—when the triumph of the right is so clearly within their reach? Will they permit this one disappointment to weaken their efforts and banish hope from their hearts? We answer No! A hundred times, No! This great cause is the cause of Virtue—of Morality—of Religion—of social progress—of humanity itself; and though it were a thousand times stricken down, it will rise again to a glorious triumph at last. It is above all political considerations, superior to all party responsibilities. It appeals alike to the interests and the duty of the People. Its success will relieve labor from a mighty burthen of taxation. It will carry comfort to thousands and tens of thousands of families, and hope and happiness to the hearts of millions in the future, who would else go down in sorrow to their graves. It will remove the most pregnant cause of pauperism and crime, and save countless numbers from the destruction that hovers over the life and eternity of the inebriate. Let no friend of the cause, then, relax any effort to carry it forward. A single man has stood between the will of the people, clearly expressed, and the accomplishment of their purpose on this subject. That will, founded as it is on the principles of Eternal Truth—upon the profoundest wisdom, and looking to the greatest possible good of the people, will not change. It will go on increasing in strength until it will sweep away the barriers that oppose its sway, and crush whoever stands in the way of its career.

MONUMENTS TO THE DEAD.

That "E. S.," or any other interested person, may understand the proposition for a monument to Eld. Cochran, the Committee would simply say, that the Church at Plainfield had resolved to erect a suitable tombstone, or monument, to his memory, at their own expense. Having learned that some others of his friends had expressed a wish to aid in this token of remembrance, for one so loved in his day, and so mourned in his death, they simply offered them an opportunity of doing it, calculating to regulate the style and expense of it, by the free offerings of his friends. We do not now, nor did we in the notice, ask any one to contribute, but simply give them an opportunity to do so if they wished. We have no idea that what might be done in such an enterprise would at all diminish contributions for benevolence elsewhere; for those who would give for this are in the habit of giving freely for other purposes; and commonly those who complain of contributions in one direction, do not help much in any other.

For the Committee, J. BAILEY.

THE TEACHER OF THE CHINESE REVOLUTIONISTS.—The following notice of Mr. Roberts, the Baptist missionary at Canton, who has been invited by the Chinese revolutionary chief to visit him and assist in the religious instruction of the people, is given in a California paper:—

> "Mr. Roberts is an original, and we may say a remarkable man. We knew him in our boyhood, before he left for that great theater on which he is now acting so distinguished and extraordinary a part. On making a profession of religion in Mississippi, where he was a large planter, he suddenly emancipated his slaves, leased out his plantation, and offered himself to the Baptist Board, in Boston, as a missionary to China. His proposition came so unexpectedly, and he being so little known, that body of Christians declined to receive him. Nothing daunted by this refusal, he packed up his trunks for China, as a missionary on his own account. Since he has been there, he has been in the service of the Northern and Southern Baptist Board of Missions, but never obeyed their orders only when it suited him."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A clergyman in one of the pulpits in Boston, a few Sundays ago, remarked that in the city churches, within the life-time of a generation, the price of a pew has ranged over a scale of valuations more extreme and capricious than that of any other article of property. A pew was recently sold for $42, for which the family disposing of it gave $1000. In another case, $550 was paid for a pew, which ten years ago was sold for $60.

The congregation of the Church of the Epiphany, Philadelphia, have made a subscription for the family of its late rector, the Rev. Mr. Fowles, amounting to about $10,000. Such substantial testimonials of the affection of a people for one who has faithfully broken to them the bread of life, is worthy of all commendation.

The "Society for the Relief of Aged and Destitute Clergymen" lately chose a committee of six, to interrogate ministers concerning their salaries. From more than a thousand ministers have they received replies, which will soon be given to the public in pamphlet form.

In 1822 there was not one convert among the natives of New Zealand. Now they can, without impropriety, be called a Christian people. Cannibalism is extinct, agricultural implements take the place of weapons of war, and the people, instead of wasting their neighbors' lands, are diligently cultivating their own.

We learn from the New York Evangelist that over one hundred and fifty of the exiled Portugese converts from Maderia, arrived in this city recently on their way to join their countrymen in Illinois. They are victims, like those who preceded them, of Romish persecution, driven from their homes for no earthly reason but their love of Christ and belief of the Bible.

An East India paper of Feb. 10th says "that the famous Car of Juggernaut of Muhes, near Serampore, was totally destroyed by fire on the night of Monday last, and the 'Oddekuries,' or proprietors of Juggernaut, 'have emerged in grief, attributing the accident to the fury of the gods for causes of which they were not cognizant.'"

The longest pastorate ever held in New England was by the late Rev. Samuel Nott, D. D., of Franklin, Ct., namely, seventy years, during all but three of which he discharged all the duties of pastor entirely unaided, and lacked but twenty months of one hundred years of age at his death.

The Legislature of Texas has passed a bill "to establish the Christian Sabbath," which provides for the punishment, by fine or imprisonment of such persons as may perform any labor, or procure any to be done, on Sunday.

The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, has contributed $100,000 to Home and Foreign Missions during the past year—a sum exceeding by $15,000 the amount of any previous year.

Rev. Dr. Anderson expects soon to visit the missions of the American Board in India. No officer of the Board has ever visited any of the missions in that part of the world.

Some of the Long-Islanders are making strenuous exertions to establish on their railroad a Sunday milk-train.

INTOLERANCE OF RUSSIA.—We clip the following paragraph from an article on Russia in one of our exchanges. It shows a state of things different from what most persons had supposed to exist there :—

"No Associations for Religious purposes are tolerated in Russia; no printing presses are permitted to print the Bible in the vernacular tongue of the people; no versions of the Scriptures in the only language the masses can understand are permitted to cross the frontier. It is stated that there has not been a copy of the Bible in Russ, printed in that country since 1823. Colporteurs, Bible agents, tract distributors, find as little favor with the bigoted Czar as so many Red Republicans. Even to the two millions of Jews concentrated in his empire, not a copy of the Old Testament in their native Hebrew is permitted. No Christian missions to the most barbarous and distant tribes under his sway are tolerated. The inoffensive and pious Moravians, permitted to pursue their charitable work everywhere else, have been driven from their labors in Russia.

NEBRASKA-KANSAS.—By reference to the Congressional proceedings in another column, it will be seen that the Nebraska-Kansas Bill has been passed. This bill repeals so much of the Missouri Compromise of 1820 as prohibited forever the legalization of Human Slavery in any part of the territory of the United States north of N. lat. 36 deg. 30 minutes, and east of the Rocky Mountains—that is, all of the Missouri Compromise which was favorable to Freedom. Forty-four Representatives and fourteen Senators from the Free States voted for the bill. By the votes of these men, representing Free Labor constituencies, One Million square miles of Territory, heretofore shielded FOREVER from Slavery by a borgain, forced by the South upon a reluctant and struggling North—(and whereof all that part enuring to the advantage of Slavery has been fully secured and enjoyed)—has been opened to slave-holding immigration and settlement, and so exposed to be brought into the Union as Slave States.

FUGITIVE SLAVE TROUBLE.—Boston has been the scene of great excitement, growing out of the arrest of an alledged fugitive slave named Anthony Burns. The arrest was made on Sixth-day last, and was followed by a demonstration against the proceeding, in the course of which a shot was fired that killed a man named Batchelder. The fugitive was confined in the court-house up to the evening of Second-day, and large crowds were collected in the city, from whom violence was apprehended. At 5 o'clock Second-day afternoon, it was estimated that not less than ten thousand people surrounded the court-house.

TAKEN BACK TO SLAVERY.—On Sixth-day, May 26th, three colored men, named Stephen, Robert, and Jacob Pembroke, (near relatives of Rev. Dr. Pennington,) were arrested in New York as fugitive slaves, and taken back to Maryland. The affair created considerable excitement, and much sympathy is expressed for the fugitives and their free relatives.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 22.

In the SENATE, the President presented Mr. Everett's resignation, to take effect on the 1st June. Mr. Smith presented the resolutions of the Connecticut Legislature against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Mr. Clayton offered a resolution of inquiry as to the propriety of restricting the powers of American Consuls in Spanish Islands so as to prevent them granting sea-letters in cases where they are likely to be used to protect vessels engaged in the African slave trade. A resolution was adopted inquiring into the expediency of providing steam-vessels for service on the upper lakes. A message was received from the President transmitting copies of correspondence relative to the arrest of Dr. King at Athens in 1852. The Indian Appropriation bill was then taken up, and, after a brief debate, was again postponed.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Committee on Post-Offices reported a bill making provision for postal service in California, and in Oregon and Washington Territories. Mr. Pratt presented the resolution of the Connecticut Legislature against the Nebraska bill. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Nebraska bill. At 11½ o'clock at night the bill passed by a vote of 113 to 100.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 23.

In the SENATE, the bill passed by the House providing for the organization of the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas was received. A resolution was introduced calling upon the President to transmit to the Senate copies of whatever correspondence had been had with this Government in relation to the African slave trade in Cuba. Mr. Douglas submitted a resolution of inquiry into the expediency of recognizing the independence of the Republic of Dominica, and of opening diplomatic intercourse with the same—laid over. The House bill regulating the pay of Deputy Postmasters was amended and passed. The Finance Committee reported a bill authorizing the coinage of fifty-dollar and one-hundred-dollar gold pieces. The Nebraska bill, as received from the House, was then taken up and read once—its second reading being objected to, it was laid over. The Indian Appropriation bill was then taken up.

In the HOUSE, after the reading of the journal, Mr. Maurice of New York requested to have his vote recorded among the "Nays" on the Nebraska bill, having been confined to his room by sickness on Second-day night when the vote was taken—refused. Mr. Giddings moved that 50,000 copies of Second-day's proceedings be printed, to be distributed throughout the country—lost. The consideration of Mr. Bennett's Land bill was postponed for four weeks. The consideration of the Deficiency bill was then resumed. A discussion ensued on the Senate's amendment appropriating half a million dollars for continuing the works for supplying Washington and Georgetown with water. Without concluding the debate, the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 24.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented numerous memorials in favor of a ship canal at Niagara Falls; also ten remonstrances against the Nebraska bill, including one from 105 Methodist clergymen, and from 434 clergymen of Michigan. Mr. Benjamin of Louisiana, introduced a series of resolutions passed at the recent session of the Legislature of that State relative to the annexation of the Island of Cuba to the United States. A warm debate on the subject ensued between Messrs. Clayton, Benjamin and Seward, and the resolutions were referred. The Nebraska bill was then taken up, read a second time, and debated until 5 o'clock, when the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE at an early hour went into Committee of the Whole on the Pacific Railroad bill, and its further consideration was postponed. The consideration of the Deficiency bill was then resumed, but on account of the difficulty to keep a quorum, owing to proceedings on the Nebraska bill in the Senate, the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 25.

In the SENATE, Mr. Gillette, the recently elected U. S. Senator from Connecticut, was duly qualified and took his seat. The Committee on Foreign Relations reported a resolution manifesting the sense of Congress relative to the relief afforded to the surveying party of Lieut. Strain by the officers and crew of the British steamer Virago, and voting a gold medal to each of the officers, and $100 to each of the men engaged in affording relief—adopted. A bill was reported providing for a Marine Hospital at Pensacola. The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Nebraska bill as it came from the House. After a long discussion, Mr. Clayton's amendment, depriving aliens of the right to vote, was rejected by a vote of 41 Nays to 7 Yeas. The bill was ordered to a third reading by a vote of 35 to 13, and at one o'clock the bill, as received from the House, was passed, the Senate refusing to call the Yeas and Nays. The Senate then adjourned until Second-day.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Dunbar presented the resolutions of the Louisiana Legislature relative to the Africanization of Cuba. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and, on motion, the Pacific Railroad bill was set aside. The consideration of the Deficiency bill was then resumed, and various amendments discussed.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 26.

Only the House was in session. It had under consideration the Deficiency Bill, but did little else than to reject several of the Senate's amendments, one of which appropriated $771,000 for custom-houses, another $131,500 for marine hospitals, and another half a million to supply Washington with water. Adjourned till Second-day.

ANOTHER INDIAN MASSACRE IN TEXAS.—An extra from the office of The San Antonio Western Texan, dated May 8th, gives the following account of another Indian massacre:

"On Tuesday, May 2, a Government train, consisting of fourteen wagons and about one hundred mules, horses, etc., left Fort Ewell for El Paso, and had proceeded about five or eight miles from the Fort, when they were attacked by about twenty Indians, who were well mounted and armed with bows and arrows; knives, lances, and two rifles. At the time of the attack the wagon-master, Mr. McIntosh, was a short distance from the train in pursuit of a horse and unarmed, and there was only one weapon of defense among the whole train, and that was an old rifle and unloaded. The Indians made a charge upon them and killed the wagon-master and scalped him, and also killed five others. Some few escaped, and two are still missing; they are supposed to have been taken prisoners and are now with the Indians, and no doubt undergo the most horrible tortures. All the mules and horses connected with the train were taken, and the wagons destroyed completely, with their contents, amounting in all to some $20,000 or $30,000.

California News.

California dates to May 1st have been received. The following summary gives the principal items of news.

The French Consul at San Francisco, Mr. Dillon, having been arrested and brought into Court to testify in the case of the Mexican Consul, had struck his flag, and declared he would not raise it again until ordered by the Emperor.

The Mexican Consul had been found guilty, but was recommended to mercy.

Col. Fremont arrived on the 16th of April, completely broken up, only twenty men left, the greater part having deserted after crossing the Colorado.

The ship Golden Fleece, while beating out of the harbor of San Francisco on the 22d of April, struck on some rocks and became a total wreck.

The bark Walter Claxton had capsized and 13 lives were lost. She also was a total wreck.

The steamer Gazelle exploded on Columbia River, Oregon, killing 25 persons and wounding 30 others.

The accounts from the mining districts are of the most flattering character.

The markets were dull and prices of leading articles depressed.

European News.

European dates to May 13th have been received.

The report of the ship Baldaur, as to the steamship seen on the 21st April, is confirmed, but with this important addition: "The steamer was headed north, but altered her course toward the Baldaur, and immediately disappeared. The Baldaur steered to the spot and saw large quantities of biscuits and boxes. When the steamer was first seen, a bark was alongside of her, but the latter steered away south, and as no one was seen on board the steamer, it is surmised that the bark may have saved the passengers."

Negotiations for an alliance, offensive and defensive, between Sweden and the Allied Powers, are said to have progressed so favorably that they are on the point of being concluded. It is confidently stated in Paris, that Spain, Portugal and Piedmont are willing to join the western powers.

Fourteen Russian merchantmen have been captured in the Black Sea.

Full accounts are now to hand of the bombardment of Odessa. As surmised, the affair was far from decisive, being mere destruction without result.

The British accounts report the attacking force as the English steamers Sampson, Terrible, Tiger, Retribution, Furious; French steamers Mogador, Vanban, Descartes and Caton—also detachments of English rocket boats. The mode of attack was, the steamers continued for twelve hours to sail round in a circle of half a mile in diameter, 2,000 yards distance from the batteries, and each steamer delivered fire as it passed; the rocket boats continuing to throw 24-pound rockets to set the town and shipping on fire. The steamers also threw red-hot shot. The Russians fought with extreme bravery, replying to the fire of the ships. Toward night, the battery becoming untenable, its fire became slower, though regular; and at length the shipping in the rear being on fire, it was silenced. During the action, red-hot shot from the steamer Terrible blew up the Russian magazines on the Imperial Mole, and silenced a formidable battery. Three Russian frigates in the harbor took fire and burned to the water's edge, also 12 smaller ships, and two ships-of-war building. The rockets also set the lower part of the city on fire, and it burned for two days. Three of the attacking steamers were disabled, and the Vanban was set on fire, but it was extinguished. The British estimate their loss at less than twenty killed and wounded. The Russians estimate theirs at twenty killed and sixty wounded. The British Admiral after the action sent a circular to the fleet that he had inflicted retribution on the Russians for firing on a flag of truce.

The Russian accounts look as like the truth as the British. Russia says that on March 27th the British steamer Furious approached Odessa. Two guns, without ball, were fired from the batteries, and the Furious ordered not to approach nearer. The steamer thereupon stopped and sent a boat ashore with a flag of truce. The boat was respected and allowed to land at the wharf, when it was sent back to the Furious with the information that the British Consul had left. The Furious, however, again got up steam, and approached nearer, as if to survey, on which the batteries fired seven shots, not on the boat with the flag of truce, but on the advancing frigate, which then left. On the 2d April, three of the allied steamers came to Odessa to demand an explanation. Gen. Osten-Sacken expressed in writing his surprise that the allied admirals should imagine that the Russian shots were fired at the flag of truce, explained how affairs were, and of course refused to deliver up the shipping in the harbor as demanded by the admirals. Accordingly the bombardment took place.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Secretary of the Treasury has authorized the Director of the United States Mint to have the Medals of the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of All Nations struck at the Mint—the Association merely furnishing the material and paying the actual expense incurred. The medals for 1853 will all be completed during the present month. The Diplomas for 1853 are nearly all ready. The receipts at the Crystal Palace are daily increasing, and are considerably more than the expenses. The proprietors of the hotels in this City offer to present their guests with a Crystal Palace ticket until the first of August next. Several jobbing-houses and other stores are presenting tickets to their customers. A number of large manufacturers are furnishing all their workmen with tickets to the Crystal Palace.

EARTHQUAKE AT SAN SALVADOR.—On the Sunday following Easter week, a terrible earthquake occured at San Salvador, by which two hundred persons were killed and upward of four millions of property destroyed. The first sensation felt was on the night of Easter Thursday, and it seemed like the rumbling of heavy waves. In consequence of the volcanic nature of the country, no serious attention was paid to the disturbance of the earth, and it continued as above described until about noon of Sunday, when the earthquake occurred. Hundreds of the houses, which are built of mud brick, were prostrated in a moment, and for a brief time the atmosphere was filled with dust. The cathedral erected many years ago by the Castillians, was shaken to its foundation. Many of the beams of the structure were displaced, and one of the timbers in its fall seriously injured the Bishop and several of the Priests who were at the time offering prayers that no calamity should befall them. On the following Monday hundreds of people came to San Salvador and commenced the work of plundering from the ruins. It was found that about two hundred persons, many of whom occupied offices of distinction, were killed. The loss of property is estimated at four millions of dollars.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENTS ON THE PACIFIC.—The last California mail brought accounts of two of the most disastrous steamboat explosions which ever occurred on the Pacific coast—one in the bay of San Francisco, and the other at Canemah, in Oregon territory. On the morning of the 15th April, the steamer Secretary burst her boilers, while on a voyage from San Francisco to Petaluma, in Sonoma County—when sixteen of the passengers (among them the veteran explorer, Maj. Ebbets) were killed, six badly injured, twenty-three slightly injured, and eight saved unhurt. It is stated that the Secretary was racing at the time with another boat named the Nevada, and that the explosion was the result of the criminal recklessness of the engineer. On the 8th April, the steamer Gazelle, after landing at Canemah, O. T., burst her boilers, blowing the decks, etc., to atoms. Twenty persons were killed, and double that number severely injured. The cause of the accident is not known.

Of the 424 inmates of the Insane Asylum at Utica during the past year, 90 were intemperate, 100 were addicted to the use of tobacco, 28 had no education, 187 were not connected with any religious denomination. The probable causes of derangement are stated as 14 from spiritual rappings, and 125 from intemperance and other vices.

It is stated that a very successful experiment has been made on the Hudson River Railroad with coke made from the Cumberland Coal Company's coal, in driving locomotives. If coke can be used in locomotives instead of wood, it will open a new market for coal, and make a considerable saving to railroads.

On the 15th of April the City of Neutreas was visited by one of the largest conflagrations ever known in that country. The entire city was destroyed, together with some seventy or eighty thousand hides; a large lot of deer skins and other produce. It is supposed many lives were lost.

The Board of Excise in Homer, Cortlandville and Scott, Cortland County, N. Y., have refused liquor licenses to all the public houses in those towns. Some of the hotels have applied for and received temperance licenses.

On Sabbath morning, May 20th, several persons were injured by an explosion, caused by gas, in the new building No. 119 Nassau-st., New York.

DIED,

In Hounsfield, Jefferson Co., N. Y., May 23d, 1854, at 11 o'clock A. M., of a combination of complaints, long protracted, PATIENCE, wife of John Witter, aged 74 years, 6 months, and 5 days. She was a member of the Independent Seventh-day Baptist Church in Adams. At her death she expressed a strong confidence in her God, and her willingness to meet death. The funeral was attended by a large concourse of people at the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in Hounsfield, on the 24th, at 11 o'clock A. M. Sermon by Eld. A. Campbell. J. W.

In Coloma, Washara Co., Wis., May 12th, ANGELINE, wife of Walter Brown, in the 21st year of her age. Her illness, though short, was so very distressing that for the last three days she could not breathe without groaning. She has left a circle of mourning friends, and an infant daughter too young to know the loss it has sustained. She was a worthy member of the Milton Church, and though for the last two days deprived of her reason, except momentary returns, we have reason to believe she has left this world of suffering for a home in heaven, where

WILLIAM M. ROGERS, Treasurer.

The following letter from the celebrated Dr. James C. Ayer, gives the honest side of the Nostrum question. Since the Public will use these remedies, we wish, for the sake of suffering humanity, there were more of them like his Cherry Pectoral and Cathartic Pills, which require no secrecy to make them go down.

LOWELL, 26th April, 1854.

Messrs. ——— ——— & Co.,
New York City,

Gentlemen,—Yours of the 23d inst., asking me to join in a combination to put down the Ohio Nostrum Bill, came duly to hand. I cannot accede to your request, for the following reasons:

The law requiring that the composition shall be published, of every medicine sold in the State, cannot work to the injury of any body who deserves protection. I have published the recipes of my medicines for fifteen years, and believe this to be the honest way of making their virtues known to the community. The Medical Profession publish their discoveries to the world as soon as made, for the benefit of all mankind. Why should we not? The law which you fear will destroy your business, can injure only those who falsely pretend to discoveries and secrets which they have not. It will expose the emptiness of such pretensions, and the public will turn aside from such preparations as are found to be worthless, when their composition is known. If medicines have real worth, they will be only the better appreciated and the better patronized by laying their composition open to the public, that all may judge for themselves. If they have not real merit, it is due in common justice, to the suffering sick, to the public health, and to the cause of humanity, that the people should know them to avoid them. Yours respectfully, JAS. C. AYER.

To Printers.

A NEW EDITION OF THE SPECIMEN BOOK OF BRUCE'S NEW YORK TYPE FOUNDRY, was published in September, 1853, and will be given to those proprietors of Printing Offices who will send for it, or it will be forwarded to them by mail on receipt, in advance, of fifty cents for the postage.

In it are exhibited many articles never before shown; there have been added to the Foundry new varieties of Roman Types from Nine-line Pica to Pearl, various imitations of Writing, a great number of fancy founts, borders, both plain and illuminated, labor-saving rules, and a complete foundry of German.

The types now manufactured are cast from a new combination of great durability, and are usually kept on hand in large quantities. Every fancy fount is sold by weight, and at the printed prices, which are from ten to twenty-five per cent. less than those of some other foundries. All other printing materials are furnished at manufacturers' prices, either for cash or credit.

Printers wishing to open accounts with me, or whose dealings have been long suspended, are requested to accompany their orders with city references to prevent delay.

Printers of newspapers who choose to publish this advertisement, including this note, three times before the 1st of August, 1854, and send me one of the papers, will be paid for it in type when they purchase five times the amount of their bill from me, of my own manufactures, selected from my specimens.

GEORGE BRUCE,
50—3 13 Chambers-st., New York.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life—increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proved, beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combinations of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

J. C. Ayer, Dear Sir,—My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever. His throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your Cherry Pectoral in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a tea-spoon full every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better, and after three days use he was able to eat or drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines—but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world. I am yours, with great respect,

J. D. POWELL, Supt. Trans., L. R. R.

Rock Hill, (Somerset Co.,) N. J., July 21, 1852.

Dr. J. C. Ayer,—Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any other cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me
Yours, with respect, JOHN C. WHITLOCK

Windsor, C. W., June 26, 1852.

J. C. Ayer, Sir,—This may certify that I have used your Cherry Pectoral for upwards of one year; and it is my sincere belief that I should have been in my grave ere this time if I had not. It has cured me of a dangerous affection of the lungs, and I do not overstate my convictions when I tell you it is a priceless remedy. Yours very respectfully,

D. A. McCULLIN, Attorney at Law.

Wilkesbarre, Pa., Sept. 28, 1850.

Dr. J. C. Ayer, My dear Sir,—Your medicine is much approved by those who have used it here, and its composition is such as to insure and maintain its reputation. I invariably recommend it for pulmonary affections, as do many of our principal physicians.

I am your friend, CHAS. STREATER, M. D.

The Country School-House.

BY J. A. BLACKMAN.

Hard by [illegible] road and dusty street,
Where [illegible] throw a cooling shade,
And frequent tread of playful feet
A bare and beaten way has made;
The school-house standeth, old and rude,
And there a score of years hath stood.

The windows are curtainless and bare,
Are marred [illegible] with a broken pane,
Until the sharp autumnal air,
Or wintry blast, beat through again;
And the rude benches and the walls
Are rough with uncouth cuts and scrawls.

The rill that bubbles sparkling by,
Has [illegible], unbroken flow;
Its flood [illegible], mimic mills supply,
And infant navies o'er it go;
And where it slumbers still and wide,
The boys in winter skate and slide.

And passing by the half oped door,
You hear the teacher, loud and clear,
Pouring his precepts evermore
Into the young and listless ear;
Patience and hope his toils attend,
And to his heart their sunshine lend.

A plain contented man is he,
He [illegible] no incense mean to fame;
'T is his alike unmoved to be,
'Mid [illegible] flattery or blame;
A husbandman in mind's rich soil,
He deems it proud to delve and toil.

He loves to gaze on coming years,
And [illegible] those buoyant spirits climb—
Frail creatures of his cares and fears—
High [illegible] the fame paved mounts of Time;
And thinks, right hopefully, to share
Their triumphs and their honors there.

Now at the sudden wane of day,
O'erjoyed to hail their labors o'er,
The little legions, wild for play,
Burst forth with frolic and uproar;
While down their mirth's Lethean tide
All thoughts of books and lessons glide.

Dearer than all earth's kingly halls,
Thou, rough old school-house, art to me:
Thy time-darkened sides and crumbling walls
Hoard [illegible] a precious memory
Of that fair past, when life was new,
Seasons [illegible] days, and dreams were true.

Not in high pompous courts of state,
Proud freedom's land! thy hopes enshrine;
But where for life's great combats wait
Truth [illegible], radiant and divine;
Time's [illegible] destinies are wrought,
Where the young potent soul is taught.

A Novel Scene.

An officer on board the "Duke of Wellington," line of battle ship, (Sir Charles Napier's,) the chief of the Baltic fleet, describes a scene as follows. It will be seen that the laconic address of the Commander-in-Chief, signalized to the rest of the fleet, announcing the declaration of war, differs slightly from previous reports of it:—

April 4. At noon to day the Old Duke looked as if she was dressed for a holiday; she was covered with flags, forming a general signal to the fleet, which had anything but a holiday signification—it was the Commander-in-Chief's declaration of war, and ran, word for word, as follows:

"Lads! War is declared, with a bold and numerous enemy to meet. Should they offer us battle, you will know what to do with them. Success depends on the precision and quickness of your fire. Also, lads! sharpen your cutlasses and the day is your own."

The Blenheim, Captain the Hon. F. T. Pelham, immediately answered, "Ready and willing," the Neptune, Capt. Smith, "Ready"—and every ship manned her rigging and gave three such cheers as are seldom heard in those waters. Ourselves and all the ship's company were then called up on deck, and Commodore Seymour then read the signal to us; and the men were beginning to follow the example of the other ships, when the old Admiral came forward, and, leaning over the poop railing, said:

"Now, my lads! you have just heard what the Commodore has said to you; and all I have to say is, you must be cool and collected—don't throw your shot away. A shot fired in the air or water is of no use. Make every one of them tell; we have quite a different system now to what we had in the last war. I have no doubt some of you have been in action before, but it will be different to what you have been accustomed to; but Admiral Chads showed you, the other day, that a shell bursting between decks is not so dangerous as you imagine; and if one comes on your deck, you must lie down, and it won't hurt you more than the common splinters of an ordinary action. Should we meet the Russian fleet at sea, as I dare say we shall, you will know how to dispose of them. We will now man the rigging, and give three cheers for the Queen—God bless her!"

The men rushed to the rigging and gave three times three for the Queen and one cheer more, and three for the Commander-in-Chief. This was followed by the rest of the fleet, and peal after peal came floating over the waters, until the most distant sounded like the echo of the other. Hands were piped down—men under punishment were forgiven, and an extra glass of grog given each man at supper-time.

Farms Improved by Keeping Sheep.

To some extent, keeping sheep is found to improve a farm, as they consume much feed that is left by other stock and lost, and at the same time enrich the ground, and give it a better and smoother appearance. This is shown by instances quoted in the transactions of the Norfolk Agricultural Society, which we relate in brief:—

A man having a small farm, formerly kept forty sheep, four cows and one horse, and had food enough for them the whole year round. The price of wool falling, he sold his sheep, and for a number of years has kept other stock altogether. He now keeps but three cows and one horse, the year round, and pastures two cows extra through the summer, sells very little hay—not half enough to keep another cow; he has the same amount of pasture and mowing as when he kept the forty sheep in addition to his other stock, and yet his farm does not look near as well as then. He used to raise turnips among the corn for his sheep to eat in winter, and gave them besides a few bushels of grain. The lambs, however, more than paid for his extra feed.

Another farmer for a great number of years kept about sixty sheep, eight or nine cows, (or other stock equal,) one pair of oxen and one horse. After keeping the sheep for a number of years, he found he could then keep as large a stock on his farm with the sixty sheep, as he could keep without them before; showing that they had improved the farm to furnish their own support. To stock a farm entirely with sheep would not be so profitable as to keep a limited number—yet it would pay as well as other stock. The object is to keep enough to consume that part of the vegetation peculiarly fitted to sheep, and which other stock will not eat, adding at the same time enriching elements to the pastures and yards by their manure. It is the opinion of many farmers that pastures for other stock may be improved by keeping a small flock of sheep upon them a portion of the time, and the opinion seems fairly supported by reason and experiment. Moulding from Life.

Hayden, the painter, when in the beginning of his career, and all enthusiasm to master art, fell in with a negro from the United States, whose magnificently developed form fired him with the design of taking a cast of the entire man. But we must let him tell the story in his own words:

"Pushed to enthusiasm by the beauty of this man's form, I cast him, drew him and painted him, till I had mastered every part. I had all his joints moulded in every stage, from their greatest possible inflexion to their greatest possible extension. The man himself and the moulders, took fire at my eagerness, and after having two whole figures moulded, he said he thought he could bear another to be done if I wished it; of course I wished it; so we set to again.

"In moulding from nature great care is required, because the various little movements of the body produce perpetual cracks, and if the man's back is moulded first, by the time you come to his chest he labors to breathe greatly, so that you must then have the plaster rubbed up and down with great rapidity till it sets. We had been repeatedly baffled in our attempt at this stage, and I therefore thought of a plan to prevent the difficulty, to build a wall around him, so that plaster might be poured in, and set all around him equally and at once. This was agreed upon. The man was put in a position, extremely happy at the promise of success, as he was very proud of his figure. Seven bushels of plaster were mixed at once and poured in till it floated him up to the neck. The moment it set it pressed so equally upon him that his ribs had no room to expand for his lungs to play, and he gasped out, 'I—I—I die.' Terrified at his appearance, for he had actually dropped his head. I seized, with the workmen, the front part of the mould, and by one supernatural effort, split it in three large pieces, and pulled the man out, who, almost gone, lay on the ground senseless and streaming with perspiration. By degrees we recovered him, and then looking at the hinder part of the mould, which had not been injured, I saw the most beautiful sight on earth. It had taken the impression of his figure with all the purity of a shell, and when it was joined to the three front pieces there appeared the most beautiful cast ever taken from nature, one which I will defy any one in the world to equal, unless he will risk, as I unthinkingly did, the killing of the man he is moulding. I was so alarmed when I reflected on what I had nearly done, that I moulded no more whole figures. The fellow himself was quite as eager as ever, though very weak for a day or two. The surgeons said he would have died in a second or two longer. I rewarded the man well for his sufferings, and before three days he came, after having been up all night drinking, quite tipsy, and begged to know, with his eyes fixed, if I should want to kill him any more, for he was quite ready, as he had found it "a good concern." However, I had done with him, and would not venture, as I had mastered his form, to run any more such risks."

Neat Cattle in England.

Without assuming to decide which is the best breed of cattle in Great Britain, Mr. Nash, the intelligent correspondent of the Country Gentleman, asserts it to be unquestionable, that the raising and propagation of fine cattle is among the prominent means by which the present advanced state of British agriculture has been reached. It is his opinion, that owing to climate, Americans can never rear or propagate that watery, bloated, and to the eye, admirable size, and plumpness of form seen there. But with all this, Englishmen, he thinks, can never produce beef of as good a flavor as American, fatted on Indian corn. Notwithstanding this, the English, in estimating the value of thier oxen, look chiefly to their qualities for the meat market, and not, as with us, to their power in the draught. For they reject their labor as a general thing, and so do not—we think mistakenly—take his ability to perform labor into account as we do. They think less of milking qualities than we, and dream only of beef, beef, BEEF. The animal which will produce most fat and flesh, is in most esteem. Fat meat is more to an Englishman's than to an American's taste.

Mr. Nash visited the farm of Mr. J. S. Tanqueray, of Hendon, Middlesex, distinguished for his herds, which are among the best in that country. His farm contains three or four hundred acres.

His herd is of the Short-horn vs. Durhams, containing upwards of 100 animals. Among the first lot shown us were the recent purchases from the celebrated Tortworth sale, of the late Earl Ducie's stock, of which accounts have been published by yourself and others. In this lot was the far-famed cow, Duchess 55, bred by the late Mr. Bates, of Kirkleavington, three of whose calves have lately been sold for the astonishing sum of 2,300 guineas; Grand Duke, to Mr. Thorne, of New York, for 1,000 guineas; Duchess 64, to the same gentleman for 600 guineas; also, the daughter of this cow, Duchess 66, to Col. Morris, President of the New York State Society, and Mr. Becar, of New York. This beautiful heifer is now at Hendon, under the care of Mr. Tanqueray. These gentlemen also joined Mr. Tanqueray in the purchase of a bull at the the sale of Earl Ducie's stock, called the Duke of Gloucester, for 650 guineas; and rather than lose him, they were prepared to give higher for him than ever was given for an animal of this character. It will be observed that at the Tortworth sale, three of his calves sold each for 300 guineas or more, one of them a calf, at the time, of only a few weeks old, realizing 310 guineas. This last was from the heifer of Messrs. Morris & Becar, which at the the time of the sale, was under three years old, so that the heifer, at this early age, and her calf, but a few weeks old, brought upwards of 1,000 guineas. Mr. Tanqueray also purchased Duchess 69, from the same cow as the Duke of Gloucester, calved in March last, for which he paid 400 guineas. This is a splendid specimen of the Durham. We may form some idea of the spirit and enterprise of this gentleman, from the fact that his purchases at the Tortworth sale alone exceeded 2,000 guineas. From his herd have been exported of late into the United States, several fine specimens. These have gone to Col. Morris, Mr. Becar, and Mr. Thorne, of New York; Mr. Alexander, and other gentlemen in Kentucky and Ohio; Messrs. Kelley and Remmington, of Philadelphia; and to Mr. Levi A. Dowly, of Boston.

Mr. Tanqueray has given a neat and picturesque appearance to his grounds; perfect neatness and economy in his farm buildings prevail. His animals, down to the pigs, of which there are many, breathe sweet air; and the ladies, whose titles his animals bear, might visit his premises without boots, and without carrying anything away to remind them where they had been, though the nature of the soil, and position of the stalls and yards are such, as in some hands would render them intolerably filthy. The improvement of neat cattle perhaps, has reached its maximum in England, and its diffusion has been going on, till the average weight of animals is doubled in the English market, and the time of rearing them shortened; yet this diffusion is now advancing more rapidly than ever. A competent judge remarks, that Aldernay cows are best for milk, and Durhams for beef.

The Oregon Pea.

Mr. A. B. Rozell, a farmer of Nashville, Tennessee, communicates to the Daily Union and American some of the results of his experience as to the great utility of the celebrated Oregon pea. He says:—

"The pea grows on a bush from five to six feet high, with five or six large branches near the ground; and they with the main stalk, put out other branches, until two stalks would make a bunch as large round as a tobacco hogshead, or near it. It grows more like cotton than anything else I know of, only it is much larger, and the branches not so horizontal. After leaving the ground a little, all these branches, with the branches they put out at every joint, bear from four to ten pods in a bunch, with about fifteen peas in a pod; so they are hung with peas pretty much from top to bottom. The leaves are very large and beautiful, and taking it altogether, it is the most beautiful and rich plant I ever saw.

"The stalks and leaves make perhaps the finest hay in the world—stock preferring it to any other—and yielding a greater abundance than any other. The hay and pea together, is a better and far cheaper feed than can be raised from any thing else in the United States for horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and hogs. I believe I can raise more and better feed for my stock from one acre of land, than I can from any thing else I know of. It will grow on land so poor that it would produce little or nothing else; and tolerable poor land is better for it, and will produce more than rich land. This may appear strange to some, but it is nevertheless true. Rich land will produce more stalk but not so many peas; in this respect, it is like cotton. As an Improver of the soil, I consider it far superior to clover, or anything known in Tennessee, when fed off on ground, and then plowed in. Now, taking it altogether, I consider it one of the greatest acquisitions to the farmers of the valley of the Mississippi that has been introduced for the last thirty years; and I am of the opinion it will prove a greater blessing to the farmers of Tennessee, and surrounding States, than the many boasted railroads that are now being built among us, and that many of us are being taxed heavily to pay for their construction."

Mr. Rozell had a part of his crop ready for market on the 2d inst. He would raise about forty bushels of peas this season. All the peas of last year's crop were sold at $2 per quart, or $1 per pint, or $80 per bushel They can be had this year, at either of the above places, at $40 per bushel, or $1 per quart or 50 cents per pint.

Items for Farmers.

Birds and Corn.—Birds must eat, and it is natural for them to look in the plowed fields for food. Of course they will pull up your corn, unless you prevent them by making it unfit for food. If you shoot or poison the birds, you will kill your friends. If you wish to prevent them from eating up your seed corn, pour a bushel of seed into a tight vessel and heat a pint of tar and pour it over the corn, and add warm water and stir all together until the grains are coated with tar; then drain off the water, and add lime, ashes or plaster, or wheat bran, enough to adhere to the grains, so that you can handle them without sticking, and the birds will not pull your crop as soon as it comes above the surface.

Butter.—Not one pound in five of butter sold in this city is fit for human food. Butter makers should remember these few short rules:

The newer and sweeter the cream, the sweeter and higher flavored will be the butter.

The air must be fresh and pure in the room or cellar where the milk is set.

The cream should not remain on the milk over thirty-six hours.

Keep the cream in tin pails, or stone pots, into which put a spoonful of salt at the beginning, then stir the cream lightly each morning and evening; this will prevent the cream from moulding or souring.

Churn as often as once a week, and as much oftener as circumstances will permit.

Upon churning, add the cream upon all the milk in the dairy.

Use nearly an ounce of salt to a pound of butter.

Work the butter over twice, to free it from the buttermilk and brine, before lumping and packing.

Be certain that it is entirely free from every particle of buttermilk, or coagulated milk, and it will keep sweet forever.

In Scotland, a syphon is sometimes used to separate the milk from the cream, instead of skimming the pans.

Hedges.—Osage Orange Hedges are all the rage now, since almost every other plant that has been tried has proved a failure nine times out of ten, and the one time is not anything like a safe, permanent fence. The Osage Orange Bois d'Arc, is, in its natural condition a tree, as much so as the apple tree. The young hedges, if carefully set and cut back well, grow to a good fence. If neglected they soon run to the natural form of trees, and are worthless as a fence. It is yet to be proved whether the hedge that is well trimmed every year, will live and prove a close fence. It is used by Mr. Longworth of Cincinnati, to fence his vineyards, and keeps out all intruders. The plants are easily grown from the seed, if properly treated by soaking in boiling hot water. They should be planted in nursery beds in May, and transplanted to the hedge rows next spring. Cut the shoots off close to the ground, and set the roots not over six inches apart. The soil of your hedge-rows must be rich, deep and mellow, as the plants are gross feeders, and a full grown hedge admits no other plant to grow near it to any advantage.

Leather for Manure.—Old boots and shoes, and old harness and shoe shop scraps are first rate manure. They may be eaten up in ashes or ley, or added to the compost heap, or chopped fine and plowed in the soil. Old woolen rags and scraps of wool, hair, skins, all should be treated in the same way.

Mr. Stephenson, of Edinburg, applied one cwt. of nitrate of soda and two cwt. of common salt per acre to a wheat crop, and increased the yield nine bushels per acre.

On the 25th and 27th of October next there is to be a great Cattle Show at Springfield, Ohio. Twenty acres of ground have been inclosed and 200 stalls erected for cattle.

When the bark slips freely in June, July, or August, is the best time to girdle trees. Cut the small growth three feet above ground; the roots do not sprout, and the stumps are more easily removed.

A tun of broom corn will make 1,200 or 1,360 brooms. It is worth $50 a tun, beside the seed. It is a great crop in the Mohawk Valley.

Fence Posts, steeped in a solution of blue vitriol—one pound of vitriol to forty pounds of water—will last forever and be pretty good after that.

Red Ants may be driven away by sprinkling fine sea shore sand upon the shelves.

Chickens should be kept in coops, with floors above the ground, until they get strong enough to run at large.

Bones may be decomposed by putting them between layers of wood-ashes moistened in a barrel. Bones and eggshells should be thus disposed of as fast as they come from the kitchen. A strong heating compost heap will decompose bones. Diluted oil of vitriol in an old kettle or big earthen jar, is a good thing into which to cast the waste bones.

A recent traveler thinks we shall become exporters of flax, instead of importers, in a few years.

Tomatoes should always be bushed just as much as peas. Tomatoe plants should be trimmed also, and not permitted to bear all the fruit that sets upon the bushes.

We have an account of a cow owned by John B Decker, of Wantage, N. J., that is thirty-two years old and has a young calf, the fifteenth in nine years. She has brought over forty calves in her time. She gave 20 to 24 quarts of milk last summer. She was raised by the father of her present owner. Her teeth are yet good. This cow with all her descendants, if alive, would make one of the greatest cattle-shows ever seen in this country.

Shaping Trees and Shrubs.

Who has not observed the great difference in beauty between a handsomely-shaped tree, and one of uncouth or distorted form, of the same species? How often do purchasers of ornamental trees and shrubs anxiously search for symmetrical specimens, forgetting or not knowing, that the most irregular may be easily pruned into any desired shape? If the Dutch gardeners display so much skill in training vegetable growth in peacocks and hedgehogs, American gardeners may find an appropriate exercise of their skill in imitating the graceful and beautiful in nature.

At the present season, or during the commencement of vigorous growth, this desirable object may be most easily accomplished. By occasionally removing needless shoots, but more frequently shortening-back such as are overgrown or pinching-in those that threaten to become so, and by looping certain portions to induce dormant buds to push where branches and foliage may be deficient, a degree of skill may be exercised, not unworthy of comparison with that of the artist who developes a beautiful statue from a shapeless block of marble.

Even small plants, which otherwise would grow tall and meagre, may be made to assume a bushy and thick appearance, by pinching off the ends of the leading shoots while they are young. The English gardeners have acquired a skill in managing in this way their pot plants intended for public exhibition, that is really astonishing to those who first witness the rich and symmetrical masses of flowers and foliage which they are thus enabled to present to view.

A great error is often committed when flowering plants are placed in open ground, by crowding them too closely together, giving them too much the appearance of weeds. They are much the best when every plant is allowed full room to expand. When crowded, the flowers are fewer and more imperfect, and the plants and foliage slender, and greatly inferior in beauty to the dense and rich mass of well developed leaves and bloom of a freely growing uncrowded plant. Influence of a Newspaper.

A school teacher, who has been a long time engaged in his profession, and witnessed the influence of a newspaper upon the minds of a family of children, writes to the editor of the Ogdensburg Sentinel, as follows:—

I have found it to be a universal fact, without exception, that those scholars of both sexes and of all ages, who have had access to newspapers at home, when compared with those who have not, are:—

1. Better readers, excelling in pronunciation and emphasis, and consequently read more understandingly.
2. They are better spellers, and define words with ease and accuracy.
3. They obtain a practical knowledge of geography, in almost half the time it requires others, as the newspaper has made them familiar with the location of the important places, nations, their governments and doings, on the globe.
4. They are better grammarians, for having become so familiar with every variety of style, in the newspaper, from the common place advertisement to the finished and classical oration of the statesman, they more readily comprehend the meaning of the text, and consequently analyze its construction with accuracy.
5. They write better compositions, using better language, containing more thoughts, more clearly and connectedly expressed.
6. These young men who have for years been readers of the newspapers, are always taking the lead in the debating society, exhibiting a more extensive knowledge upon a greater variety of subjects, and expressing their views with great fluency, clearness and correctness in their use of language.

Value of a School Master.—There is no office higher than that of a teacher of youth, for there is nothing on earth so precious as the mind, soul and character of the child. No office should be regarded with greater respect. The first minds in the community should be encouraged to assume it. Parents should do all but impoverish themselves, to induce such to become the guardians and guides of their children. To this good all their show and luxury should be sacrificed. Here they should lavish, whilst they make use of frugality in everything else. They should wear the cheapest clothes, live on the plainest food, if they can in no other way secure to their families the best instruction. They should have no anxiety to accumulate property for their children, provided they can place them under influences which will awaken their faculties, inspire them with higher principles, and fit them to bear a manly, useful and honorable part in the world. No language can express the cruelty and folly of that economy which, to leave a fortune to a child, starves his intellect and impoverishes his heart. [Channing.

A Death-Bed Revelation.—A large wine dealer residing in London, recently on his death bed, being in great distress of mind, acknowledged to his friends that his agony was occasioned by the business he had followed for years. He stated that it had been his habit to purchase all the sour wines he could, and by making use of sugar of lead and other deleterious substances, restore the wine to a palatable taste. He said he did not doubt he had been the means of destroying hundreds of lives, as he had from time to time noticed the effects of his mixtures on those who drank them. He had seen instances of this kind where the unconscious victims of cupidity, after wasting and declining for years, despite the best medical advice, went to their graves poisoned by the adulterated wines he had sold them.

VARIETY.

A California correspondent of a Kentucky paper gives the following account of the manner in which a law suit was settled in the Golden State: One neighbor sued another upon a disputed account; the parties met, a Jury assembled, and all was ready for the trial. At the suggestion of the Judge, the parties agreed to decide it by a horse-race, and actually did so; the Jury acted as Judges, the counsel bet their fees on their respective clients, the Judge held the stakes, and the winner, by previous agreement, treated the crowd!

Gen. Sam Houston first entered Congress as a Representative (from Tennessee) thirty years ago. He has since been Governor of Tennessee; then a fugitive from her borders; then an Indian chief; then a pioneer of Texas; then leader of her revolution; then President; then out of power, and esteemed a dissipated, broken-down demagogue; then President again; a reformed man and Temperance advocate; then and finally Senator of the United States, which position he has held for the last eight years.

According to the London correspondent of the Boston Post, the people of Spain are in a bad predicament. They despise and abhor the present sovereign; but there is not in the whole family of Spanish Bourbons a single eligible, or even respectable prince to take her place. Don Paula is imbecile, Count Montemolin a puerile bigot, Don Enrique a worthless vagabond, and the Duke of Montpensier too much French to suit the Spaniards.

It is computed, says the Ledger, on calculations furnished by the census returns, that 663,000 new house have been built in the United States in the last six years, which, at an average of $1,000, would add $663,000,000 to the wealth of the country, to say nothing of the furniture necessary to the habitations; the shipping and railroads, however, would increase this amount to over $1,000,000,000

The Chicago Journal records the departure of quite a fleet of vessels from that port, all loaded with grain, for Buffalo and Oswego. The fleet numbered nineteen vessels, (three barks, six brigs, and ten schooners,) having on board 260,120 bushels, of which 208,332 bushels were of corn, 32,039 bushels of wheat, and the balace barley and oats. Of the whole quantity over 213,000 bushels went to Buffalo.

Different nations have different kinds of loafers. The Italian spends his time in sleeping; the Turkish loafer in dreaming; the Spanish in praying; the French in laughing; the English in swearing; the Russian in gambling; the Hungarian in smoking; the German in drinking; and the American in talking politics.

Man is like a snow-ball. Leave him in idleness, against the sunny fence of prosperity, and all the good that's in him melts like fresh butter in hot days; but kick him around, and he gathers his strength every revolution until he grows to an avalanche. To make a figure in the world, you must keep moving.

OCEAN PENNY POSTAGE.

BY ELIHU BURRITT.

The whole reduction of postage contemplated in this project, is exclusively confined to the single item of the ocean transit. It is proposed that this single service shall be performed invariably for one English penny, or two cents; leaving the different governments to reduce or retain their present inland rates, just as they please. If this project were adopted, the whole charge on a single letter from any town in the United States to any town in Great Britain, would be seven cents; to any town in France, ten cents; to any town in the Postal Union of Germany, nine cents, provided the inland rates in these countries should remain as at the present moment. The American Post Office would receive five cents for every single letter thus transmitted across the sea, or three cents for the American inland, and two cents for the ocean transit.

The proposition of a universal Ocean Penny Postage has been held up before the public mind, on both sides of the Atlantic, for several years. In Great Britain, more public meetings have been held in favor of this postal project, during the last two years, than for all other reforms put together, involving parliamentary action. The subject has been brought before the House of Commons, and a committee of inquiry is to be appointed by that body, during its present session, to investigate this proposition, and report upon its feasibility. It has already commended itself to the sympathy and support of eminent men of all political parties in that country, and there is every reason to believe, that a majority in both houses of Parliament will vote for its adoption, so far as it depends upon the action of the British Government. It is of vital importance to the realization of the scheme, that the United States shall coöperate with England in giving to mankind the inestimable boon of this cheap ocean postage.

One of the first and most important considerations adduced in favor of this project, is the almost universal conviction that it may be adopted without occasioning any sensible loss of revenue to the Post Office. Take one important direction, for instance, in which the system proposed would produce the greatest benefits, and involve the least hazard of income. Full three-fourths of all the foreign commercial correspondence between the United States and the rest of the world, cross the Atlantic via Great Britain. All the American mail steamers to Europe touch at Liverpool or Southampton. All the British steamers to America sail from Liverpool or Southampton. The whole gulf stream of emigration from Europe to North America flows in this direction. Will the United States coöperate with England in establishing a penny transit rate in this one important route, as the first instalment of a universal ocean penny postage? If the system were carried out in this direction, would it produce as much revenue as the existing rates?

The whole charge on a single letter, at the present time, from any town in the United States to any town in Great Britain or Ireland, is 24 cents. Under the system proposed, it would be seven cents; or three cents for the American inland, two for the ocean transit, and two for the British inland service. Then an ocean penny postage must bring into the mail bags about four times the number of letters now conveyed in them, in order to produce the present amount of revenue.

It has been generally conceded by men of cautious judgment, and of large experience, on both sides of the Atlantic, that the persons in America and Europe who now correspond with each other across the sea, would write twice, under an ocean penny postage, where they write once under the existing system. This would double the number of letters now conveyed across the Atlantic. Here we have half the requisite augmentation.

There are 400,000 persons who emigrate from Europe to North America every year. These are all new correspondents, annually increasing by several hundred thousand. Give them an ocean penny postage, and they would, on an average, write to their friends in the Old World, at least two letters per head, annually, and receive two in return. Thus, these new correspondents would produce 1,600,000 letters during the first year of the new postal system, 3,000,000 the second, and probably 5,000,000 the third, after allowing for all the deaths that might be anticipated among them during that period. These letters would all be in addition to the number written and received by those who now correspond across the ocean.

The reduction of the ocean transit to two cents would break up the clandestine conveyance of letters by private hands, and bring into the mail bags a great amount of mailable matter now conveyed outside of them, on the very steam packets that are paid such a large sum for their transportation.

An ocean penny postage would almost entirely put an end to the custom of enclosing, in one envelop, several communications, written on thin paper, and addressed to as many different individuals, residing in different parts of the country to which the packet is transmitted. Under the system proposed, these letters would be generally writen on ordinary paper, and posted as distinct communications, each paying the legitimate postage.

This reduced rate of postage would greatly diminish the number of dead letters, which now occasion a great expense of labor to the Post Offices on both sides of the Atlantic. These dead letters are conveyed twice across the ocean, and incur several inland services. In 1851, their number between the United States and Great Britain averaged about 10,000 per month.

In view of these, and other sources of increase, the most cautious mind, surely, must admit, that no serious loss of revenue could accrue to the Post Office Department from the establishment of an ocean penny postage between the United States and Europe, via Great Britain.

It would not cost the Post Office a farthing more for the transportation of its mails across the ocean, than it does at the present moment, though they should contain ten times the amount of matter now conveyed in them. Nor would it even be necessary to quadruple the bulk or weight of the mail matter, but only the number of the letters, in order to realise, under an ocean penny postage, the whole revenue derived from the existing rates. For, as one of the effects of the present system, tons and tons of old newspapers, pamphlets, reports &c., are conveyed across the sea for no earthly purpose but to communicate to distant friends what may be expressed in the manuscript direction on the cover.

Although an enormous sum is paid by the American and British Post Office Departments to the Collins and Cunard lines of steam packets, for the transportation of the mails across the Atlantic, this circumstance does not militate against the practicability and safety of reducing [illegible] cents per letter. It rather furnishes a new argument in favor of a reduction by which the people of the two countries can only receive back the worth of the vast sum of money which they pay for the sea service on their correspondence. Whatever be the amount paid to the different lines of ocean steamers for this service, if the reduction proposed should quadruple the number of letters transmitted, the same amount of revenue would be derived under the low rate, as from the existing charges.

But if the Post Office Department insist upon the positive proof that a reduction of the ocean transit charge to two cents will not occasion any loss of revenue; if it cannot be persuaded to adopt this low rate at once, on every ocean mail route, and by every line of mail steamers in its pay; if it must try some informal experiment, as a preliminary to the establishment of a universal ocean penny postage, there are screw steamship companies ready to convey all the letters that cross the Atlantic for two cents apiece. The agent of one of these companies has offered publicly and repeatedly to do this, and his offer has been widely published in the journals of the United States and Great Britain, and it has been pressed upon the attention of the British Government by a member of Parliament. Powerful screw steamers, from 1,500 to 3,000 tons, that make the transit, on an average, in less than fifteen days, are plying regularly between the principal ports of the two countries; and they are increasing so rapidly, that, in the course of the present year, a semi-weekly departure and arrival of one of their number may be expected. There is no room for doubt, that all these steamship companies would readily agree to convey across the Atlantic any amount of letters for two cents per half-ounce. The Post Office could not lose any thing by this arrangement, especially as the amount it now pays for the sea service on its mails exceeds by far the revenue it derives from them. This might not afford satisfactorily expeditious transmission for strictly commercial correspondence; but the merchants, on both sides of the ocean, could well afford to pay for the speed they almost alone require. They might continue to dispatch their letters by the Cunard or Collins line of packets, and at the present charge, if it must absolutely be retained. Full one-half the letters that cross the Atlantic are written and received by the emigrants from Europe in this country, most of whom are poor, hard toiling day laborers. Three days' difference in the ocean transit of their letters is of no appreciable importance to them. It seems almost cruel to compel a poor Irish or German housemaid to pay, as she does now, nineteen cents for the mere sea service on her letter to an aged mother in the Old World, when private enterprize offers to perform that service for two cents, with a difference of only three days in the transit. Why should she be constrained to pay, in the charge on that letter sixteen cents for that mere difference of speed, which is almost only of importance to the merchant?

The United States, by a recent step, have taken the lead and surpassed all other nations in Christendom, in the policy of cheap ocean postage. The American Post Office now conveys a letter from the remotest town in California or Oregon to Bremen for ten cents. This sum covers all charges upon it for three long ocean transits and three inland services. Nor are these transit services performed by screw steamers, but by paddle wheel steamships of the first class in size and speed. It requires but a small step in advance of this, on the part of the United States, to give the world an ocean penny postage, and thus immeasurably promote the happiness and win the gratitude of its sea divided families. How small is that step! The American Post Office now conveys a single letter from New York to Bremen for ten cents. Could it run any serious hazard by conveying one from New York to Liverpool for seven cents?

The benefits that would accrue to every class of the community, to every interest and enterprise of Commerce, Civilization, and Christianity, from the establishment of a universal ocean penny postage, would be infinite and indescribable.

Correspondence is the right hand of commerce, and the reduction proposed would give it an impulse and expansion which are indispensable to its legitimate development and prosperity. New branches of domestic trade have been originated and carried on through the agency of cheap inland postage in the United States and Great Britain. Samples of dry goods, groceries, &c., as well as trade circulars, are transmitted by post from town to town in both countries. The penny postage is not only a medium of communicating private intelligence, but actually of conveying light and costly articles, as jewelry, &c., from one end of the country to the other. A reduction of the ocean transit to two cents, would operate in the same way upon foreign or international commerce, opening up a vast number of mercantile transactions across the sea, which the present postal rates render utterly impossible. Samples of goods, fruit and flower seeds, specimens of grain, of woods, of minerals, even, as well as circulars and trade cards, would be transmitted across the ocean. Under the pressure of the existing rates, the New York or Boston commission merchant generally sends his circular to England in manuscript, to be printed and posted there by some correspondent. All he pays for ocean postage on the whole transaction is 24 cents on the letter that conveys the manuscript of his circular to the English printer. The same is done extensively by British merchants and manufacturers in reference to the United States. These trade circulars will never get into the ocean mail bag, until the transit service on them shall be performed for two cents per half ounce. When this low rate is established, they will doubtless cross the ocean as letters, and thus vastly augment the commercial correspondence between the two countries.

There is no measure within the constitutional competency of the U. S. Government [illegible] of this country, which would do more to increase their social happiness, and to secure their sympathy and gratitude, than the establishment of an ocean penny postage. They number at this moment full three millions in this country, who have left behind them in the Old World at least fifteen millions of relatives and friends, to whom they are bound by the strongest ties of nature and affection. These poor men and women from Europe produce at least half the letters that cross the Atlantic, and, owing to the poverty of their friends across the sea, they pay the postage on the letters they receive from them, as well as on those they write. Thus, nearly the whole direct, sensible tax for the transmission of the mails across the Atlantic, is imposed upon the emigrants from Europe in the United States. For most of the letters which they do not write or receive, are the business communications that pass between rich merchants in America and Europe, who never pay the postage on them out of their own pockets, but charge it, as they are expected to do, on the goods sold to their customers. As an illustration of the strength and warmth of the social affections existing between these emigrants and their friends in the Old World, the fact may suffice, that the Irish alone in this country sent across the sea to their friends more than $5,000,000, during the year 1852, in sums probably not averaging more than $20 per remittance. Thus it required 250,000 letters merely to convey this amount to as many different homes scattered all over Ireland.

An ocean penny postage would connect and permeate all the sea divided communities of mankind with myriads of new ties and veins, to strengthen and beautify their brotherhood with bonds of sympathy and the circulation of knowledge. It would be one of the most powerful aids to the work of Christian Missions; for all the good impressions produced upon the emigrants to this country from pagan and semi-barbarous populations of Asia and Europe, would flow back upon the lands of their birth in full running rivulets of religious influence.

An ocean penny postage is demanded by the social necessities of the Anglo-Saxon race, which now numbers more than sixty millions; and, before another century rolls its round, will number 500,000,000 of human souls, if it continue to increase at the ratio of the last sixty years. The United States, in the course of their expansion, must constitute the grand family centre of this mighty race, both by locality and attraction. Now is the juncture at which to intensify that attraction, by freeing every current of our social and political influence from impediment; by giving the principles and ideas of our best institutions unrestricted egress. So shall this sisterhood of States hold to its heart, with bonds stronger than "hooks of steel," the vast populations of that race of which it will soon be the first numerical representative. By all the considerations embraced in these important facts, we trust every American Christian, philanthropist, patriot, and citizen, in every post or sphere he may fill, will exert his influence in favor of the immediate establishment of a UNIVERSAL OCEAN PENNY POSTAGE.

NAPOLEON AND MRS. JUDSON.

Rev. Dr. Taylor, missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, who has recently arrived from China, enclosed a slip from the Richmond Christian Advocate to the N. Y. Recorder, which contains some interesting information in reference to the graves of Napoleon and Mrs. Judson, which he visited when at St. Helena.

"That of Napoleon, now vacant, is situated in a lovely vale, about three miles from the anchorage at Jamestown, and is surrounded by trees, and flowers, and grass, and shrubbery. It fully realized all my anticipations of beautiful scenery in its rustic dell. But in that of Mrs. Judson I was painfully disappointed. I had read of it as being in the valley of Jamestown. Perhaps it was from the associations of my boyhood, but I had not thought of a valley, and especially a graveyard in a valley, without connecting with it the images of a pretty greensward, the sweet wild-flowers, and the ideas of undisturbed stillness and quiet retirement, away from the busy haunts of men, and from the noise and bustle of every-day life. Judge, then, of my surprise and disappointment, to find the burial-ground in the heart of the town, which is as densely built, and necessarily so, as any part of your most populous cities. For it is crowded into a narrow gorge, but six hundred yards in its widest parts, between two high, steep, barren hills. A paved street runs along one side of the ground, which is hemmed in by buildings, and is surrounded by a high stone wall, through which a gate leads from the street. It is the English Episcopal burial place, and no dissenting minister can be allowed to perform a funeral service within its walls. This exclusiveness will, however, be of no practical inconvenience hereafter, for, by a town ordinance recently passed, no more interments can be permitted to take place there, as the ground is already quite crowded. Not a blade of grass, not a single flower, nor any green thing, did I see, except, if I mistake not, a few trees along the lower side of the enclosure, one of which—a species of banyan—partly shaded the grave of Mrs. Judson. Their leaves were all covered with the dust, which is ever rising from the loose, barren soil, except during the wet season, when, I was informed, it is a mass of mud. Notwithstanding the unlovely and unattractive appearance of everything about the place, I stood by this grave with very different feelings from those with which I stood by the empty tomb of Napoleon. The headstone is very neatly lettered, and contains a most appropriate inscription, but is so soiled and discolored by the tenacious dust, that you would hardly suppose it was ever white marble.

"The Baptist mission on the island has a most beautiful cemetery on the hillside of a charming valley, where they are now building a neat country church and parsonage, two [illegible] To this lovely, secluded spot, they desire to remove the remains of Mrs. Judson; and I sincerely hope, for the sake of all that is sacred and endearing in our association of rural beauty with the resting-place of the loved and gone, every hindrance may be speedily removed, and they may soon succeed in effecting this truly praiseworthy design."

From the Boston Recorder.

"LOVE NOT TOO WELL."

O, when I gaze upon his brow,
And look into his beaming eye,
Or, bending o'er, as I do now,
When sleep has laid his laughter by;
And listen for his breathing deep
To tell me that it is but sleep;
A something whispers to my soul,
With power beyond my weak control,
Love not too well!

O, never let the fault be mine,
The brightest form of earthly mould
My loving heart can e'er enfold,
To worship as a thing divine.
Yet who the magic line has found,
That deep—a mother's love—to sound?
Or who shall claim the power to know
When such affection's changeless flow
Loves but too well?

Is it the mother, to whose eye
No smile is passed unheeded by;
Whose ear can catch the faintest tone
Of that sweet voice so all her own;
Who loves, with trembling glance, to trace
The lights and shadows of that face,
Whose every pleasure, every pain,
Is mirrored in her own again?
Go ask that mother: Can she say,
Though love holds such unbounded sway,
She loves too well?

Full oft the loving heart is found
Unable its own depths to sound;
Till it, like frailest earthly things,
Falls with the prop to which it clings,
And finds, alas! but all too late,
The secret of its bitter fate;
A voice, in that dark hour of woe,
Whispers the soul in breathings low,
Love not too well!

That thrilling voice—O, is it not
Oft heard from love's most sacred spot?—
Some little coffin's closing lid,
Where buds, too fair for earth, lie hid;
Some grassy hillock, short and wide,
Where withered flowers lie [illegible]
Some marble column's chiseled lines,
Where morning cypress darkly twines,
Breathing, in solemn, saddened tone,
O'er cherished forms for ever gone—
Love not too well!

O, Thou, to whose unerring eye
Each human heart doth open lie,
Whose sympathizing love can cheer,
Whose smile dispels each rising fear,
Whose strength but makes our weakness known,
Leave us, O leave us not alone.
Show us THYSELF—then shall we be
So drawn with love supreme to thee,
That earthly forms, however dear,
Shall find no cause to bid us fear
They're loved too well! J. P. E.

EFFICACIOUS PRAYER.

The following instances of remarkable answer to prayer will serve to impress on the minds of our readers that prayer really avails to secure the blessing we need and desire, on which point we are constrained to believe there is far too much skepticism in the churches.

The first instance is taken from Professor Park's Memoir of Rev. Dr. Hopkins, page 155. There was a slave named Newport Gardner, in Newport, Rhode Island, who earnestly desired to obtain his liberty, and that of his wife and children. He was allowed by his master to labor for his own profit during whatever time he might gain by extra diligence. "The slave devoted all this gained time to procuring the means of liberating himself and family. He was finally advised by a deacon of Mr. Hopkins' Church to spend this time in fasting and prayer for his liberation, and he was assured of more rapid success, in this course than in that of manual labor. Accordingly, having gained a day, this pious negro, without communicating his plan to any but Mr. Hopkins and two or three Christian friends, spent that day in secret fasting and prayer that he might obtain his freedom. His master, totally ignorant of his slave's occupation, sent for him about four o'clock in the afternoon; but was told that Newport was engaged for himself, this being his gained day. 'No matter—call him,' says Captain Gardner, his master. After some hesitation the slave was called, and the owner gave him a paper, on which was written—'I, Caleb Gardner, of Newport, Rhode Island, do this day manumit and release forever Newport Gardner, his wife and children,' etc.; adding some conditions which could easily be complied with." The slave received his manumission with gratitude to his owner, but with still deeper gratitude to his all-wise Disposer above, who had signally answered his request for freedom, even before he had finished his supplication.

The other case is recorded in Wayland's Life of Judson, volume second, pages 32 to 37. While engaged in the missionary work in India, Dr. Judson became intensely interested in behalf of the Jews, and desirous of establishing a mission to Palestine. He awakened a sympathy in his views and feelings among his brethren, and in the bosom of an officer of rank in the East India Company's service, and together they raised one thousand dollars, which they pledged to the American Baptist Board, provideed they would send a missionary to the field referred to. Accompanying the pledge, he also forwarded a most powerful appeal in behalf of the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The plan, however, did not meet with favor, and he received no reply to his proposal, although he wrote to severat ministers in America on the subject. Thus apparently ended the effort. Long afterward, however, and only two or three days before he embarked on his last voyage, and not a fortnight before his death Mrs. Judson read to him the following paragraph from Rev. Dr. Hague's journal in the Watchman and Reflector, of his travels in the east:—"There [at Mr. Goodell's house in Constantinople] we first learned the interesting fact which was mentioned by Mr. Schauffler, that a tract had been published in Germany, giving some account of Dr. Judson's labors at Ava; that it had fallen into the hands of some Jews, and had been the means of their [illegible] Bizond, where a Jew had translated it for the Jews of that place; that it had awakened a deep interest among them; that a candid spirit of inquiry had been manifested; and that a request had been made for a missionary to be sent to them from Constantinople. Such a fact is full of meaning, a comment on the word of inspiration. 'In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand—thou knowest not which shall prosper, this or that.'"

Mrs. Judson, in her relation of these facts, continues: "His eyes were filled with tears when I had done reading, but still he at first spoke playfully, and in a way that a little disappointed me. Then a look of almost unearthly solemnity came over him, and, clinging fast to my hand, as though to assure himself of being really in the world, he said, 'Love, this frightens me; I do not know what to make of it.' 'What?' 'Why, what you have just been reading. I never was deeply interested in any object—I never prayed sincerely and earnestly for any thing, but it came, at some time—no matter at how distant a day—somehow, in some shape—probably the last I should have devised—it came. And yet I have had so little faith! May God forgive me; and while he condescends to use me as his instrument, wipe the sin of unbelief from my heart.'"

"If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." [Congregational Herald.

THE TELL-TALE.

Allow me, Messrs. Editors, to tell your readers one or two facts, and to ascertain whether or not I have acted rightly.

A few days ago, brother John Candid met me in the street, and with an awfully long face and lubricous tones began to tell me of a sad report which rumor was spreading of brother Isaac Honest. The tale in itself was not much, but the shrugs of the shoulder, the significant shakes of the head, and the speech of the eye, which said, "I am afraid—or rather, I hope it is all true," made the case appear a very bad one. Happily, I felt no disposition to believe a charge against a brother, especially as it was insinuated rather than openly alledged; and therefore I asked, "Well, brother Candid, have you seen brother Honest on this subject, and ascertained from him the facts of the case?" The reply was, "No, my dear brother; I really have not time to attend to the matter; besides which, you will understand that I do not believe it to be true." "Well, my brother," I replied, "I shall go direct to brother Honest, tell him what you say, and ask him as to its truth." The look of the good man in return was a picture. How fervently did he implore me to take no further notice of it; and what solemn assurances did he give me, in a five minutes' further conversation, that he would be more cautious! I have at present yielded to his entreaty; but whether my conduct was right or wrong, perhaps your readers can determine better than I can; at all events, brother Candid, should he repeat the offense, will not fare so well at my hands another time.

A short story more. Thirty years since, I was pastor of a church in which were some female gossips, a race which I will hope are rapidly dying away. Nothing could occur in connection with the church, but these prate-aways could make mischief out of it. At a church meeting I stated that I was resolved to destroy this practice of scandal; and that I would embrace the very first chance of tracing its author. An opportunity soon offered; a young lady was proposed for church fellowship, and the detractors were quickly at work. I overheard one telling another of a pretty story, which on its very surface indicated exaggeration. "Is this true?" I asked. "I do not know, sir, but I hope not." "Why do you report what you are not sure of?" "Mrs. —— told me, sir, and I was only just mentioning it in confidence." To Mrs. —— I went, and found that she had told some thing, but not quite so bad as reported. I insisted on her authority, and went on tracing the report from one to another, till it ended in—nothing. Not quite so, either; for the whole facts were stated to the church, who very wisely strongly censured the practice, and for a period at least checked the evil. Did I act rightly in this case?

I have lying before me a sermon very recently delivered in one of our large cities, and printed only for private circulation. I will borrow its closing paragraph. "My hearers, be cautioned against such abuses. Let us bridle our tongues. Let us put a check upon our curiosity. Do your own business! Next to your own, be careful of your neighbor's reputation. Be slow to believe aught against him. Give no credence to flying reports. Reject unfounded insinuations. Pay no attention to rumors that go about like orphans in the world, or fondlings whom none dare own. Remember, 'that what every body says must be true,' is a sophism worthy of the father of lies. As matters stand, every body's word is worth no body's taking. If you hear against your will, demand proof of what you hear. Let not the scarcity of truth be atoned for by the abundance of affidavits. Keep the truth on your side. Speak evil of no man. If your neighbor injure you, tell him his fault alone. If he wish it, forgive him. Be no busy-body. Hate tale-bearing. Oh, if all would do thus! would there not be a millennium? But poor, weak, perverse human nature!—wicked and inexcusable, as well as human!—alas, my hearers!"

ALL FOR CHRIST.

In the town of L—— I knew a man, some years ago, who was eminent for his financial abilities, but remarkable also for his greediness for gain. He was an usurer and a miser. He had amassed nearly all his immense fortune by taking advantage of the necessities of his neighbors. During the progress of a powerful revival in the town where he resided, Mr. M—— was brought to penitence and prayer; he even prayed before his family; and the whole community were amazed when it ran from mouth to mouth that the old miser had been seen in an inquiry meeting. The pastor of the church pointed out to him his besetting sin, and told him that unless he would give up the unjust and illegal practices of which he had been guilty, he would grieve away the Spirit and destroy his soul.

Within a few days he was waited on by a neighbor, who urged him to engage in a pecuniary speculation which would bring him large but unlawful gains. The allurement was too strong—the transaction was agreed to—and the Spirit of God immediately left him! That very night he refused to pray; and he relapsed immediately into the most shocking profanity and contempt for holy things. The aged scoffer still lingers, ripening, we fear, for an awful perdition. He would not give up all for Christ.

I have read too of a lawyer in I——, who was brought under deep conviction of sin. He was in great mental distress, and was urged to embrace the Saviour at once. An election was approaching in which he was to be a prominent candidate. When his pious friends conversed with him, he answered: "I know that I have a more important election to secure than that for which I am a candidate here. When this political canvass is over, I will secure the salvation of my soul." He was warned that he was grieving the Holy Spirit, but he remained resolute. The canvass ended. He was defeated, and, under the influence of shame and remorse, he plunged into intoxication, and became a wretched sot! He would not give up all for Christ.

If these sad incidents shall meet the eye of an inquirer who, like the "young ruler" in scripture, is hesitating between Christ and the world—between the Saviour of sinners and the snares of earth—let me tenderly exhort you to hesitate no longer. Do not falter or tamper for a single hour. Give up all for Christ. Cry unto God for strength to make any required sacrifice and a total heart-surrender, lest a disastrous fate should be yours. And when you come to Jesus, let your penitence and faith exclaim in words like these:

"Just as I am—poor, wretched, blind—
Sight, riches, healing of the mind,
Yea, all I need, in thee to find,
O Lamb of God, I come!

"Just as I am—thy love unknown
Has broken every barrier down:
Now to be thine, and thine alone,
O Lamb of God, I come!"

ALL SORTS OF MINDS.

There is a strong disposition in men of opposite minds to destroy each other. A grave man cannot conceive what is the use of wit in society; a person who takes a strong common sense view of the subject, is for pushing out by the head and shoulders an ingenious theorist, who catches at the slightest and faintest analogies; and another man, who scents the ridiculous from afar, will hold no commerce with him who tests exquisitively the feeling of the heart, and is alive to nothing else; whereas talent is talent and mind is mind, in all its branches. Wit gives to life one of its best flavors; common sense leads to immediate action, and gives society its daily motion; large and comprehensive views, its annual rotation; ridicule chastises folly and impudence, and keeps men in their proper sphere; subtlety seizes hold of truth; analogy darts away in the most sublime discoveries; feeling paints all the exquisite passions of man's soul, and rewards him by a thousand inward visitations for the sorrows that come from without. God made it all! It is all good! We must despise no sort of talent; they have all their separate duties and uses; all the happiness of man for their object; they all improve, exalt, and gladden life! [Sidney Smith.

HOW TO READ THE SCRIPTURES.—"I would recommend you," says one, "to pause at any verse of Scripture you choose, and shake as it were every bough of it, that if possible some fruit at least may drop down to you. Should this mode," he remarks, "appear somewhat difficult at first, and no thought suggest itself immediately to the mind capable of affording matter for a short ejaculation, yet persevere, and try another, and another bough. If your soul really hungers, the Spirit of the Lord will not send you away empty. You shall at length find in one, and that perhaps a short verse in Scripture, such an abundance of delicious fruit, that you will gladly seat yourself under its shade, and abide there as under a tree laden with fruit."

The secret of Dante's struggle through life was in the reckless sarcasm of his answer to the Prince of Verona, who asked him how he could account for the fact that, in the household of princes, the court fool was in greater favor than the philosopher. "Similarity of mind," said the fierce genius, "is all over the world the source of friendship."

THE RULE OF PREACHING.

Whatever the world may decide with respect to the gospel scheme, facts have proved it to be "the wisdom of God." It is a scheme of wisdom, because it is adapted to the end which it proposes. It secures that end without fail, for none ever yet trusted in Christ, and were confounded.

A most important question, then, arises—What is the best method of preaching the gospel? And the obvious answer is, To preach it in all that plainness of speech, and simplicity of illustration, in which we find it revealed. Paul used great plainness of speech, and contended that, if the gospel was hid at all, it was not because he kept back any part of it, or failed to declare the message in language suited to the comprehension of his hearers. Jesus Christ resorted to the greatest simplicity of illustration. His references were always to things with which the common people were quite familiar. He seemed to aim at making himself understood by persons of the lowest capacity, and in no instance did he depart from this rule. Neither he, nor his Apostles, aimed at philosophical speculations; they sought simply to reach the consciences of their hearers, and to make them feel their need of a Redeemer.

It is feared, however, that the simplicity of the gospel method is too often forgotten. A preacher, whose audience embraces a considerable number of intellectual men and women, labors under a strong temptation to adapt his discourses to their elevated habits of thinking. He feels that such hearers must be retained, at all events, and he makes mighty efforts, from week to week, to enrich his discourses with argument, with scientific allusions and quotations from the classics, hoping thus to gain his point. Probably, he does not mean to please men at the expense of being faithful to God; perhaps, he thinks that he is adopting the best method of doing good. He fears that, if men of intellect do not receive the gospel, the community at large will at length despise it; and so, for the sake of preserving in behalf of religion that influence which the upper classes are supposed to exercise over the lower, he gives them special attention.

Certainly, we have nothing to object against the practice of making a sermon as rich as possible in argument, in historic references and illustrations, provided all be rendered perfectly clear to the comprehension of the most illiterate hearer in the assembly. On the contrary, we think it the duty of a minister so to prepare his discourses that they shall inform the mind, as well as move the affections. For the affections lead us astray, when they are not governed by wisdom. But we apprehend, that an unnecessary amount of labor is often expended upon the merely intellectual part of a discourse. It is overlooked, that the gospel has to do, principally, with the conscience. Sinners, for the most part, know their duty; they know that they are responsible to their Creator for their actions. The great point is to present old and well known truth in such a manner that it will shake their consciences, and drive them to the Mercy Seat.

We think, however, that the wants and wishes of intellectual men are not always understood. We do not believe that, as a general thing, they visit the house of God for the purpose of having an intellectual treat. Their minds are kept upon the stretch through the week, in attending to their daily avocations. The lawyer's brains are taxed to the utmost. The merchant and the banker are racked with mental anxiety every day. The statesman knows no rest from hard thinking. And when these come to the sanctuary, it is rather for the purpose of having their minds relaxed, than put upon some new investigation. These all understand the minister's appropriate duty; and they expect him to probe their consciences, to appeal to their sense of justice and right, to reprove them for their sins, and to do it without fear. They do not look for what are called intellectual discourses; they do not wish them, and would be much better satisfied, if the minister would always deal more with the conscience, if not less with the intellect.

Besides, men of intellect are not all intellect. They have like passions and feelings with the common people. They are quite as great sinners, and if they get to heaven, they must go by the same path that their rougher neighbors do. Though they use their knowledge as the means of governing others, they are not a whit more apt to govern themselves by it, than the lower orders are. Like the lower orders, they are governed by their affections, and vile affections too. Hence the necessity of dealing with them, in preaching the gospel, just as we deal with the common people. Indeed, they themselves expect it, and will, in most cases, hold the minister in greater respect for his faithfulness.

Again, we think much mistake prevails in regard to the extent to which the favorable regard of the upper classes is necessary to secure the respect of the common people for religion. The gospel has always had to work its way in the world in spite of the opposition of "the wise and prudent," and it is not ascribing too much to its power to suppose, that it can still do so. Certainly, nothing should transpire to evoke their opposition, but their coöperation is no more necessary than the aid of Egypt was to the Israelites when they were in trouble. Unwilling as they may be to acknowledge it—blind, indeed, as they may be to the fact—the upper classes are much more under the influence of the common people, than the common people are under theirs. Important reforms never begin with the former. They are afraid to stem the torrent of popular prejudice. They feel that their comfort depends, very much, upon the amount of favor which they can secure from the common people. But the common people feel otherwise. And all history shows, that reforms have begun with the common people, and till they were pretty thorougly leavened, the upper classes were not ready to move. It has been emphatically so in the progress of the gospel; and that minister evinces the truest wisdom, who adapts his efforts in preaching to the circumstances of the poorer classes.

On the whole, it is a good rule, in preaching, for the minister to fix his mind upon the most ignorant members of his flock, and to make it an object so to speak that such shall not fail to understand. If he promotes their edification in Christ, he is pretty certain to have attained the great object. T. B. B.

THE EASTERN ASSOCIATION—AGAIN.

Our notice, last week, of the meeting of the Eastern Association, was necessarily hasty and incomplete, rendering it necessary to add two or three paragraphs this week.

The subject of ordination was quite extensively discussed during the meeting. The church in New York had requested the Association, either directly or through its presbytery, to examine a candidate for the gospel ministry, with a view to his ordination if the examination should prove satisfactory. No doubts were expressed as to the fitness of the candidate, but there were some who doubted the propriety of sending candidates to the Association, and thought that the churches ought to do their own ordaining, by the aid of councils or otherwise. Those who took this view, enlarged upon the danger of ministers being regarded as the creation of Associations, and amenable to them, rather than to the churches. On the other side, it was maintained, that scriptural example is quite as much in favor of associational as of church ordination, and that ordination at Associations is more convenient, and more likely to be done with simple reference to the fitness of the candidate. The proposed ordination took place; but it is probable that the discussion of the subject will have the effect, in some cases at least, of leading the churches to ordain their own candidates, where they can without too much trouble obtain suitable assistance.

The subject of communion at the Lord's table also occupied considerable time. The Committee on Resolutions introduced one to the effect that mutual participancy in the communion implies a sanction of the doctrines and practices of the communicants. This doctrine was opposed, on the one hand, by those who considered the communion as implying no more than a general admission of the Christian character of the communicants, without sanctioning their doctrines and practices in all points; and on the other hand, by those who thought that communion implied nothing of the kind—that it was simply a remembrancer of the Lord's death, and was wholly between Him and the communicant. If we mistake not, the prevailing sentiment was in harmony with the resolution, but for want of time for more thorough discussion, a final vote on the subject was waved.

Another subject which awakened some interest and discussion was presented in the letter from the church at Newport, R. I. That letter stated, that the church had been so long without a pastor that the interest on its ministerial fund had become adequate to employ a preacher for a time, and accordingly they had engaged Eld. Lucius Crandall. But there was a difficulty in the way, inasmuch as Elder Crandall had "felt it to be his duty to decline to commune with the churches of our denomination" on account of their connection with Secret Societies. The letter was referred to the Committee on Petitions, who reported to the effect that they saw no occasion for the Association to take action in the premises. This report was not satisfactory, and a Special Committee on the subject was appointed, who presented a report, which was adopted, as follows:—

The Special Committee to whom was referred the communication of the Newport Church, respectfully report: That on examination of this communication, they find it to contain two queries, which seem to claim their attention.

First—"What explanation can the Association give in respect to the course taken by some of the churches of the denomination in receiving and fellowshiping members of secret societies, in view of the Associational and Conference actions thereon?"

On this point your Committee would say, that in our opinion the principles on which the Conference and Associations are organized, and the limited constitutional powers afforded them, do not allow of their exercising other than advisory authority in matters relating to the discipline of the individual churches of which they are composed. Hence the churches have considered themselves left free to admit and fellowship in their communion members of these societies, or not, as they may consider advisable, entirely unembarrassed, by the resolves of either the Conference or the Associations.

The communication further says, "Elder Crandall having stated to the church that he felt it to be his duty to decline to commune with the churches of our denomination," on account of the course of some of our churches, as above alluded to; and then inquires—

Secondly—"What counsel the Association has to give this church in regard to the position of Elder Crandall, or what should be done in respect to the matter?"

To this question your Committee respond, that they most unfeignedly regret that any thing should exist in our churches which should cause an interruption of Elder Crandall's fellowship with the denomination, and earnestly desire that this cause, which has operated to disaffect his feelings, or the feelings of others, toward any of our churches, may soon be remedied, and that the fellowship and usefulness of Bro. Crandall and all others in our fraternal relation, may be finally secured to our churches. We know of no other advice necessary for us to offer to this honored mother of us all, than that they earnestly seek the guidance of Divine wisdom, which has so distinctly marked their history in the past, and which will enable them to administer discipline in this, and in all other matters, in accordance with the gospel of Christ, and that will eventuate in the glory of God.

In conclusion, your Committee would say, that in their opinion, had our churches seen proper to require of their members to refrain from connecting themselves with the societies above named, very much trouble to God's house would have been thereby averted, and the common cause of Christianity essentially subserved; and we fear that until this position is taken by them, internal schism, and the spirit of alienation, will continue to mar the peace and beauty of our beloved Zion.

THE PALESTINE MISSION.

On the 1st inst., the first intelligence from our missionaries to Palestine was received. The letters bear date, Smyrna Harbor, April 30th. From these letters we glean the items of most general interest, to lay immediately before our brethren and the friends of the Mission.

Bro. Saunders writes:—

"We sailed Seventh-day, March 11th, 1854, contrary to an agreement with the owners of the vessel. The captain said he was not informed of the agreement, or he would not have sailed on that day. Our slumbers were broken in the morning by the merry song of the sailors heaving up the anchor. In parting with all our friends at home, there was nothing that brought the reality, that we were leaving home, friends and country, so near as the simple act of heaving up the anchor. It seemed like letting go the last hold. But, having confidence in God's promises, we fear not. It is for the cause of our Saviour that we go."

During the first week the whole company were sea-sick. They had a succession of head winds and storms most of the time till reaching the Straits of Gibraltar, with cold and uncomfortable weather. They made the first land April 12th, thirty-two days from Boston. They passed the Rock of Gibraltar two days afterward, and arrived in the port of Smyrna on the 30th, just fifty days from Boston. As soon as possible after landing, our brethren engaged a passage to Jaffa. The price asked for their passage and freight on the steamer was $600. They finally engaged passage on board the Austrian barque "Adolar" for $290, and were to sail on the 5th of May, direct for Jaffa.

Relative to their worship on the "Rose Pool," Bro. S. writes:—

"As soon as we were over our sea-sickness, or partially so, we had meetings on the Sabbath at 10 o'clock A. M., in which we all took part. Bro. Jones generally read a chapter and made remarks from some passage. The rest talked and prayed as we felt it to be duty. We held a Bible Class at 2 P. M. We have enjoyed these seasons of devotion very much, and should have been glad to have had others that are on board with us, as they were invited, but it was seldom that any of them attended. On First-days we had meetings at 10 A. M., when Bro. J. preached, the rest taking part in the exercises of singing and praying. There was but once that any of the sailors were present, and I mistrusted they were not invited by the captain. We were not allowed to talk with them, which I thought rather strange. Aside from our company, there was not a professor on board. We hope at least some good impressions have been made on all. It has been our earnest desire and prayer, that they might be influenced by the Holy Spirit and our conduct to seek their souls' salvation. Capt. Harding called on us alternately at our meals to ask a blessing, which was attended to when we were not sick. This was a privilege we hardly expected. Pray for us, dear brethren, that we 'fall not out by the way.'"

Our missionaries were all in good health, when they wrote, and expressed their thankfulness to God for his goodness and great mercy to them. The friends of the mission will, on receiving this intelligence of their safe arrival, also join in thanksgiving to God for carrying them safely over the "great deep." A more detailed journal of their passage, &c., will be published hereafter. They may be addressed at present at Jaffa.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

I have read with interest and pleasure the article on "Secret Societies" recently published in the Recorder. Taken as a whole, I regard its positions as sound, and their elucidation clear. I have no doubt but good has been accomplished in some instances by such societies. I nevertheless sincerely believe, that Secret Societies as such are to be condemned, not because they have in some instances done good, but because the principle of secresy, in view of the weakness and depravity of the human heart, exercises, when possessed of the advantages of numerous and affiliating organizations, such a control over us as to betray us, even though we may be well-meaning persons, into the commission of grievous wrongs. I think that no man can employ that part of our Lord's prayer which says, "And lead us not into temptation," and join a Secret Society, in the popular sense of that term, and escape the charge of gross inconsistency, any more than the man who uses it and at the same time drinks spirituous liquors as a beverage. He that prays for God to keep him, must also keep himself.

Now, although the possession of such an opinion may subject me to the charge of "ignorance or superstition" upon the part of those who are wise, yet I will remind them that "ignorant" people, who are limited in their advantages, may perhaps be pardoned if they believe that it is wickedness, and not righteousness, that naturally seeks to "hide its counsel." N. V. H.

Death of Mrs. Judson.—Mrs. Emily C. Judson, widow of the pioneer missionary to Burmah, died at Hamilton, N. Y., on the 1st inst., after an illness of several months. She was a favorite contributor to the literature of the country, and was well known as a writer of popular sketches and tales which appeared over the signature of Fanny Forrester.

THE BOSTON FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE.

The case of the fugitive slave Anthony Burns, which was pending in Boston when our last paper went to press, was decided on Sixth-day, just as the slaveholders would have it. In the early part of the week, the claimant of Burns offered to sell him for $1,200, and the money was promptly raised; but, in compliance, it is said, with instructions from Washington, he subsequently declined to fulfill his engagement, and declared that the man should be taken back to Virginia. Throughout the week, Boston was in a state of intense excitement; the court-house was guarded by a strong military and police force, and a serious outbreak was apprehended. On Sixth-day morning the decision was given which consigned the poor fugitive to a life of bondage, and in the afternoon he was taken by the military to the wharf, and placed on board of a steamer, which took him to a revenue cutter, for transportation to Norfolk, Va. It is estimated that twenty thousand people lined the streets through which the fugitive was escorted; many places of business were closed, and some of them were festooned in black. To guard the fugitive, and render his rescue on the way from the court-house to the wharf impossible, required the entire police force of Boston, three companies of United States troops, one company of cavalry, an entire battalion of militia, and several pieces of artillery. By such means was the poor man taken from the court-house in Boston, on the 2d day of June, 1854, placed on board of a vessel belonging to the Government of the United States, and carried away to some one of the slave-pens or auction-blocks which abound in this "land of the free and home of the brave." We doubt if any one thing has transpired since the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 which has done so much as this to excite general indignation and a determined hostility to American Slavery.

ANTI-SLAVERY IN BOSTON.

The Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society held a three-days session in Boston last week. The fact that the case of the fugitive slave Burns was pending during the meeting, had something to do in giving shape to the resolutions discussed. The following were presented at an early stage in the proceedings, and several strong speeches were made in support of them. They express the sentiments of a large and growing class in the Free States:

Resolved, That resistance to slavehunters and slavecatchers is obedience to God; and in whatever forms they may appear among us, whether as President, Slaveholder, or Commissioner of the United States, or as Officers of the State Government, or as Southern slaveholders, or their minions, we pledge ourselves to resist them each, and by such means as we shall deem right and expedient.

Resolved, That no man should be allowed to be put on trial before any Court in this State, or in the nation, on the issue whether he is a freeman or a slave, a brute or a man; and that no Court should be allowed to hold a session in this State to try a case involving such an issue.

Resolved, That the Government of the State of Massachusetts, having in many ways demonstrated its unwillingness and incompetency to protect its citizens against kidnappers, it is the right and duty of each man and woman to protect themselves against such assaults upon their dearest personal rights, by such weapons as the conscience and judgment of each shall allow them to use.

Resolved, That the citizens of the Free States are bound to resist the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law, and to call every man to account before the tribunal of the people who shall attempt to execute it.

Resolved, That the experience of the past few days proves the necessity of a more thorough and efficient organization of the friends of freedom throughout this Commonwealth and the New England states for the special purpose of protecting our own citizens against the powerful band of kidnappers by whom the country is infested and whose presence among us is imminently dangerous to the liberty and life of every honorable and upright man.

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed by the Chair to report to this Convention a plan for such an organization.

EMIGRANTS FOR NEBRASKA.

The plan to make Kansas and Nebraska Free Territories, by sending thither large colonies of real freemen, is likely to be carried out. The Legislature of Massachusetts, at its last session, granted an act of incorporation for an Emigrant Aid Society, with a capital of five millions of dollars, which has this object primarily in view. The charter has been accepted, permanent officers are soon to be chosen, and public meetings will be held in various parts of the country for the purpose of awakening interest, securing subscriptions for stock, and enlisting emigrants. At a meeting of the corporators, held in Boston on the 4th of May, a report was presented, from which we make the following extracts to show the scope of the plan:—

The Emigrant Aid Company has been incorporated to protect emigrants, as far as may be, from inconveniences. Its duty is to organize emigration to the West, and bring it into a system. This duty, which should have been attempted long ago, is particularly essential now, in the critical position of the western Territories.

The Legislature has granted a charter, with a capital sufficient for these purposes. This capital is not to exceed $5,000,000. In no single year are assessments to a larger amount than ten per cent. to be called for. The corporators believe that if the Company be organized at once, as soon as the subscription to the stock amounts to $1,000,000, the annual income to be derived from that amount, and the subsequent subscriptions, may be so appropriated as to render most essential service to the emigrant; to plant a free State in Kansas, to the lasting advantage of the country; and to return a very handsome profit to the stockholders upon their investment.

* * * * * * *

To accomplish the object in view, it is recommended, 1st, that the Directors contract immediately with some one of the competing lines of travel for the conveyance of 20,000 persons from the northern and middle States, to that place in the West which the Directors shall select for their first settlement. It is believed that passage may be obtained, in so large a contract, at half the price paid by individuals. We recommend that emigrants receive the full advantage of this diminution of price, and that they be forwarded in companies of two hundred, as they apply, at those reduced rates of travel.

2. It is recommended that at such points as the Directors select for places of settlement, they shall at once construct a boarding-house or receiving-house—in which three hundred persons may receive temporary accommodation on their arrival—and that the number of such houses be enlarged as necessity may dictate. The new comers or their families may thus be provided for, in the necessary interval which elapses while they are making their selection of a location.

3. It is recommended that the Directors procure and send forward steam saw-mills, grist-mills, and such other machines as shall be of constant service in a new settlement, which cannot, however, be purchased or carried out conveniently by individual settlers. These machines may be leased or run by the Company's agents. At the same time it is desirable that a printing press be sent out, and a weekly newspaper established. This would be the organ of the Company's agents; would extend information regarding its settlement, and be from the very first an index of that love of freedom and of good morals which it is to be hoped may characterize the State now to be formed.

4. It is recommended that the Company's agents locate and take up for the Company's benefit the sections of land in which the boarding-houses and mills are located, and no others. And further, that whenever the Territory shall be organized as a free State, the Directors shall dispose of all their interests, then replace by the sales the money laid out, declare a dividend to the stockholders; and,

5. That they then select a new field, and make similar arrangements for the settlement and organization of another free State of this Union.

CLERGYMEN'S SALARIES.

An attempt to get at the salaries of the clergy was started lately in Boston. Queries were put by letter, and some fifteen hundred answers have been received from gentlemen of the various denominations in New England and New York.

A writer from New Hampshire says: "We know ten young men of rare promise who have not entered the ministry for fear of starvation, and we know eight who have left it for want of adequate support." A writer from Vermont estimates the average salaries of ministers in the whole State at from $450 to $500. In a particular county it is $350. In New Hampshire the average is placed at $500; and in Maine salaries range from $300 to $800 generally. Salaries in Rhode Island are much as in New Hampshire; and Connecticut may be ranked with Maine.

The average given by eighteen Congregational Churches of Berkshire, in Massachusetts, is $560. Twenty Baptist ministers in the same get but $372 each. In Franklin County, Mass., seven pastors receive from $600 to $700; seven receive over $400 and less than $600; and over twenty $400 and less. In Norfolk County, Mass., it is thought the average salary is not $600. Of more than one hundred ministers in Suffolk County, it is thought the average pay is not more than $1,200. In 1850 the income of the lawyers this country was $23,000,000; that of the in physicians, $20,000,000; and that of the clergy but $3,000,000.

Ministerial Support.—The subject of ministerial support is likely to be pretty thoroughly canvassed. At the last annual meeting of the Unitarian "Society for the Relief of Aged and Destitute Clergymen," a committee was appointed to investigate this subject, and their report has recently appeared in pamphlet form. A statement of facts has been obtained from all the parishes of the denomination in New England, and carefully arranged by the chairman of the committee, Rev. Mr. Brooks; and from these facts the following logical conclusions are drawn:—

1. The present low salaries paid to the clergy of all denominations in New England, not only subject ministers to social suffering, and lessen their respectability in the eyes of the world, but, moreover, rob them of due mental independence, and greatly abridge their professional usefulness.

2. Precarious and incompetent support prevents many young men of talent and character from entering the sacred profession.

3. The high Christian scholarship, so imperiously demanded by the new wants of the nineteenth century, will not be likely to appear under existing discouragements.

4. The inevitable consequence of the above facts is, that the Christian Church, in all its branches, must greatly suffer, and its conflict with sin and infidelity be more and more feeble.

5. The effectual remedies for this state of things are these: a thorough reform of public opinion on the subject of supporting preachers of the Gospel, and a new rally of all the friends of the cross.

Religious Liberty in Turkey.—The London Christian Times learns from its correspondent at Constantinople, that the sentence of death pronounced at Mosul against a Jewish Rabbi, for the alledged offense of blaspheming the Mohammedan religion, has been revoked by the Sultan and the Sheikul-Islam, and a severe reproof administered to the fanatic and inhuman zeal of the local authorities. An Armenian youth at Constantinople, (the son of Protestant parents,) who had been instigated by Turkish associates to profess the religion of Mohammed, and was on that ground detained by them from his relatives, had been restored to his father by the decision of a Turkish magistrate. These circumstances are significant, as showing the influence which the principles of toleration are obtaining in the councils of the Porte.

A Catechism for Slaves.—The Southern Episcopalian, a conservative religious monthly at Charleston, S. C., contains a catechism for slaves. The following is an extract:—

"Who keeps snakes and all bad things from hurting you?—God does.

Who gave you a master and a mistress?—God gave them to me.

Who says that you must obey them?—God says that I must.

What book tells you these things?—The Bible.

How does God do all His work?—He always does it right.

Does God love to work?—Yes, God is always at work.

Do the good angels work?—Yes, they do what God tells them.

Do they love to work?—Yes, they love to please God.

What does God say about your work?—He that will not work shall not eat.

Did Adam and Eve have to work?—Yes, they were to keep the garden.

Was it hard to keep that garden?—No, it was very easy.

What makes the crops so hard to grow now?—Sin makes it.

What makes you lazy?—My own wicked heart.

How do you know your heart is wicked?—I feel it every day.

What teaches you so many wicked things?—The Devil.

Must you let the Devil teach you?—No, I must not."

Pastors' Libraries.—At the recent meeting in Brooklyn of the American Congregational Union, one matter of general interest was discussed. This was a proposal to raise a fund of not less than $12,000, to be invested permanently, and the interest, with other subscriptions to be obtained yearly, devoted to the establishment of pastors' libraries. These are designed, not as gifts to individual ministers, but for the use of the pastor of the church by whom they are established; and will, therefore, be under the charge of the church-officers. The plan provides for granting not more than $50 in one year to a congregation, upon condition that they raise an equal amount themselves, the books to be approved by the Union Committee, and the whole collection to revert to them in the event of the church becoming extinct. The design is, to purchase those standard works in theology, Biblical literature, church history, etc., which are of constant use as works of reference, but are often too rare and costly for the minister's slender purse.

A Sabbath Convention.—A North-Western Sabbath Convention, so called, was held at Chicago, Ill., on the 17th and 18th of May. More than one hundred delegates were present, a majority of whom were clergymen. The Committee on Business reported an Address to the People, the chief object of which seems to have been to exhibit the evils to be apprehended from the desecration of "the Sabbath" by railroad companies. The Address was adopted, after considerable discussion and some alteration. A Constitution was also adopted, and officers were chosen, for a "North-Western Sabbath Union."

Jewish Missions.—The American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews recently held a meeting in New York, when it was stated that their receipts last year amounted to $17,437. There were employed eight missionaries and eight colporteurs. They visited and preached to the Jews in forty large cities and towns, labored in hundreds of families, distributed among them about 260 Bibles, many New Testaments, books, and thousands of tracts. The results of missionary labor are cheering. Beside convictions of the truth of Christ, removal of prejudices, turning the attention of thousands to the subject of Christianity, twenty-nine Israelites have been reported from various fields, as having professed their faith in Christ.

Increase of Evangelical Christians.—It is a very prevalent opinion, that the increase of evangelical Christians during the last half century has not kept pace with the ratio of growth in our rapidly-multiplying population. Statistics, however, prove the falsity of this opinion. For, "during the past fifty years," says a writer on religious statistics, in the Morning Star of May 3, "the number of members of the evangelical churches in the United States has increased from FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND TO THREE MILLIONS AND A HALF, being an increase of EIGHT-FOLD, while our population has increased only four-fold!"

A merchant of New York, deeply impressed with a sense of the magnitude and urgency of the claims of the unevangelized world on the class to which he belongs, growing out of their peculiar facilities for good or evil, and lamenting that they are in general so little felt, proposes to appropriate One Hundred Dollars for a Tract that may clearly and impressively set forth these claims, and enforce the responsibility which rests on merchants in view of them. The Tract not to exceed twelve pages, and to be stereotyped at the expense of the offerer of the premium.

The committee intrusted with the care of the fund for the benefit of the persecuted Madiai, have recently purchased an annuity of £63 5s. at the national-debt office, for which they paid £1078 1s. 6d. This is augmented by a sum of £40. They are fast recruiting their strength, and intend leaving Nice for some locality more congenial to their constitutions, probably Switzerland.

Mr. Dwight, missionary to Constantinople, concludes a letter to the Missionary Herald by saying that an Armenian of Constantinople, well acquainted with public affairs, has given it as his opinion that now is the time for American missionaries to work. The Government will place no obstacles in the way. The whole Armenian population, he thinks, may easily be made Protestants.

Hamilton Presbytery, Ohio, for reasons detailed at length, have resolved to petition the next General Assembly, respectfully, to take suitable measures for promoting an amicable separation of the Southern and Northern portions of the Church within their jurisdiction.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 29.

In the SENATE, a communication was received from the Secretary of State, transmitting a copy of the Penal Codes of France and other European countries. Mr. Gwin offered a resolution providing for the adjournment of Congress on Second-day, July 3, at noon. The consideration of the Indian Appropriation bill was then resumed, and after the adoption of a portion of the amendments, the bill was read a third time and passed. The Nebraska bill, signed by the Speaker of the House, was then received and signed by the President of the Senate. The bill authorizing the coinage of one hundred dollar and fifty dollar gold coins, was then taken up and read.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, at an early hour, went into Committee of the Whole on the Pacific Railroad bill. Mr. McDougall of California made a speech in favor of the bill. Mr. Gerrit Smith of New York obtained the floor, and said he intended to speak against the bill. The Committee then rose. A Committee of Conference was appointed on the disagreeing amendments of the two Houses on the Deficiency bill.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 30.

In the SENATE, Mr. Adams offered a resolution of inquiry as to the propriety of giving a pension to the widow and children of James Batchelder, who was killed during the late slave riot in Boston. Mr. Chase presented several petitions that the independence of Liberia be recognized. A bill was introduced granting land to Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama, for constructing a Railroad from New Orleans to Mobile. The joint resolution for a final adjournment of both Houses on the 3d of July, was then taken up. Mr. Dawson moved to amend the resolution by providing for a recess from the 3d of July to the third Monday in October. After considerable debate, the amendment was agreed to. The Conference Committee on the Deficiency Bill made a report recommending the Senate to recede from all former amendments, including appropriations for water works, custom houses, marine hospitals, &c., and the House to recede from its refusal to agree to the Senate amendment amending the printing law so as to give all of the printing of each House to the printer of that House. The report was adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, a bill was introduced for the construction of certain military roads in Nebraska; also, a bill providing for the sale of public lands in that Territory, and establishing a land office therein, the President was requested to communicate the correspondence of our Minister at Constantinople with the State Department. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Pacific Railroad bill. Gerrit Smith having the floor, spoke against the bill, on the ground that the Government proposed to build the road.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 31.

In the SENATE, Mr. Badger presented the proceedings of a meeting held at Wilmington, N. C., in favor of the improvement of Cape Fear River. The resolution inquiring into the propriety of granting a pension to the family of Deputy Marshal Batchelder, killed in Boston during the fugitive slave riot, was then taken up and passed. The consideration of the President's Message vetoing the Indigent Insane bill, was then resumed. Messrs. Hunter of Va., and Foot of Vt., spoke in support of the course pursued by the President.

In the HOUSE, the Indian Appropriation bill, as passed by the Senate, was returned with amendments, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. An ineffectual attempt was made to report back the bill regulating the pay of Deputy-Postmasters, as it was returned amended from the Senate. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Pacific Railroad bill, but no action was taken on it.

FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 1.

Both HOUSES met, and without transacting any public business, adjourned until Second-day.

European News.

The steamship Asia, with European news to May 20th, arrived at New York on the 1st of June.

The U. S. mail steamer Arctic struck a rock in coming out from Liverpool, and was obliged to put back for repairs.

One of the most important features of the news by this arrival, is the preparations for a rising in Italy under Mazzini, Garibaldi and Tomasseo. This outburst, it seems, is very near at hand, and we may soon hear of its result.

From the seat of war, the news is decidedly unfavorable to the Russians. They are defeated in the Dobrodja by both fever and the Turks, while they gain nothing elsewhere. None of the Turkish fortresses on the Danube have yet been besieged by them, as was reported, and there is no indication of their contemplating any forward movement. Indeed, they are alarmed about the designs of Austria, and are collecting armies in that quarter, as if to assail Francis Joseph, who on his part has ordered a large additional levy of troops. In the Baltic they have as yet suffered no serious loss, the fortress of Bomersund, on the isle of Aland, now taken by Sir Charles Napier, having previously been abandoned by them. In the Black Sea some shots have been fired at Sevastopol, but no real attack has been made upon it. The Turkish fleet has gone to carry aid to the now triumphing Circassians, and there is reason to suppose that all the Russian fortresses remaining on the eastern shore of the Black Sea must soon be captured.

The Greek insurrection is put down, and Greece itself is on the eve of seeing its capital and principal ports occupied by the French, as a force has been sent to take possession of them, provided the royal government does not at once pay up the back interest on a loan of $20,000 made to it by France in 1828, which of course it cannot do.

Joseph Varady and Franz Bartalis, agents of Kossuth, were hanged at St. George, Transylvania, on the 29th ult. Two of their associates were sentenced to eighteen years imprisonment.

The British steam frigate Tiger, 16 guns, 200 men, went ashore near Odessa, was taken and burned by the Russians. The crew made a gallant resistance.

A great fire had occurred at Constantinople. Nearly 1,000 wooden houses were destroyed.

Terrible Explosion and Loss of Life.

In Wilmington, Del., on Fourth-day, May 31st., five tuns of powder exploded at the corner of 14th and Orange streets, killing five or six persons, and fifteen horses, besides greatly damaging the neighboring houses.

There were three large teams, each conveying 450 kegs of powder, from Dupont's mills, the whole estimated at about five tuns. The powder was being conveyed from the mills to the wharf for shipment. The teams were passing along Fourteenth-st., at the time the explosion took place—the last wagon being opposite Orange-st., and immediately opposite the elegant residence of Bishop Lee. The other wagons were a short distance ahead. The Bishop's house was terribly shattered. The roof was lifted up bodily and broken into fragments. The front wall fell into the street. The floors were broken up, and every window and door in the house was torn away and broken to pieces. There was, fortunately, only one servant and a child in the house—the Bishop and his family being absent attending a Convention of the Diocese, a few squares off. The servant [illegible] escaped nearly unharmed.

Three houses on Orange-st., below Fourteenth-st., were completely destroyed. One of the houses was a wooden structure, and it was utterly demolished to its very foundation. A young Irishman was fatally injured, and died shortly after the disaster. Another man was very badly cut, and his clothes were torn off; his wife was also very seriously injured. Their child fell into a cellar, and was taken up uninjured. Two other families living in the house were more or less injured.

The fragments of the wagons, horses and drivers were blown in all directions. A human arm was found 300 feet from the explosion, and one of the drivers was lodged on the shore of the Brandywine. The tire of one wagon, weighing one hundred pounds, was thrown a distance of 200 feet, and a fragment of another tire was driven nearly through the trunk of a large tree.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Your article of last week in relation to "Birds and Corn," I have many times heard asserted as a sure remedy, but for some years past have tried the same to my own satisfaction. It is very true that "birds must eat," and such as have not had a fair training in the corn-pulling business, might resort to what would seem to us a more agreeable method for securing a support, but those (especially the "blacklegs") that have been subject to "hooking" from the cornfields will not forget the many glad times that they have realized in so doing. This is manifest from the fact, that when the crow or some other of the corn-pulling tribe enters a field of "tender shoots," and commences his would-be delightful task, he is not satisfied with devouring a few of the feeble blades, in search of a kernel that is suitable to his taste, but, being possessed with a good share of the "grit," he goes into it man fashion, nor will he give up that his search is in vain till he has laid waste a shocking degree of the farmer's anticipations.

Many other means I have resorted to, but none have yet proved entirely successful, and none, I think, more so than the strewing now and then a little fresh grain over the fields for the entertainment of "our friends" until the growth becomes too large to "stoop" to the power of birds.

J.

SLAVERY ALREADY IN NEBRASKA.—The pretense that slavery cannot go into Nebraska and Kansas until expressly legalized therein, is pretty thoroughly exposed by the fact that it already exists there in fact, though not in law, in violation of the Missouri restriction. William Walker, a most intelligent half-breed, and Wyandot chief, who emigrated with his tribe from Ohio to Nebraska in 1842, thus writes, under date of March 25th, 1844:—

"There is one fact relating to Slavery in this Territory, of which perhaps you are not aware, as I perceive it is not generally known in the East, viz: The existence of Slavery here, among the Indians and whites, in defiance of the compromise of 1820. It has been in existence ever since it was organized as an Indian Territory. True, there are not many slaves, but still Slavery exists. Some slaves are held by the Indians by virtue of their own laws and usages, and some by regular bills of sale from citizens of Missouri. White people going into the Territory by authority of the Government, in the character of Indian Agents, licensed traders, mechanics, teachers, missionaries, &c., hesitate not a moment to take slaves with them, regarding it as slave territory, and the prohibitory clause a dead letter. The opinion prevailing so generally, was fortified by a decision of one of the Circuit Courts of Missouri, deciding that the Indian Territory, properly so called, was slave territory."

A HORRID TRAGEDY.—A woman by the name of Mrs. Banty, and five small children, attempted to cross Kickapoo Creek in a wagon, at a shallow ford four miles from Atlanta, Ill., on the 15th May. The current carried the horses and [illegible] into deep water, [illegible] wagon down the stream and threw them [illegible] wagon had turned over, all into the water. [illegible] caught the two youngest children under one arm, and with the other hand she caught the end of a limb which hung in the water. The oldest, twelve years old, drifted down the stream one hundred yards and lodged against a hanging willow. He had scarcely crawled upon it, when his little brother came along, and, with presence of mind perhaps unequaled, he caught him, but was unable to get him out of the water. While holding his head above water, his drowned sister came floating by; he caught her, and held for some time, but being unable to save both, he let the body go, and rescued the living child until assistance was rendered. The cries of the mother soon brought the neighbors to the spot, who, after a while, succeeded in rescuing her from her perilous position, with one of the children she had with her; the other was drowned. The boy who had lodged against a willow was rescued.

SUMMARY.

The Belleville (St. Clair Co.) Tribune of May 28th, contains the particulars of a very destructive tornado which visited that county on the 16th. An immense amount of valuable property was destroyed. The storm originated in Missouri and crossed over to the Illinois side several miles below St. Louis. In Waterloo, Monroe Co., a brick house was blown down, as well as four or five other houses, together with large quantities of standing timber and orchards. The storm next passed over to the farm of Fred. Merrill, where it was terrific beyond description, destroying everything within its reach for a great distance. The house was a two-story brick building, comparatively new, with 13 inch walls, stout and substantial in every respect, which was almost entirely destroyed. A large number of houses, some of brick, and others log and frame, were blown down, besides barns, fences, forests, &c.

We have one month later intelligence from New Mexico, giving full details of the different battles between the United States troops and the Indians. A fight between the troops under command of Lieut. Davidson, and Jicarilla Apaches, at Cienequilla in March last, was one of the severest that ever took place with the Indians. Of Lieut. D.'s command twenty-two were killed on the field, twenty-three wounded, and upwards of forty horses killed and lost in the action. Of the Indians it is not known how many were killed, but their loss is estimated at [illegible] sixty. The Indians appear to be getting tired of the war, and are ready to surrender all the plunder they have taken, and make peace.

A man in the employ of Mr. James Fisher, Jr., at Manchester, near Richmond, Va., while engaged in throwing up a quantity of earth, discovered among it a sparkling substance which he threw aside as of no value. Mr. Moore, another workman, took it up, and, upon examination, was so much impressed with the singularity of its appearance, that he determined to keep it. He submitted it to several jewelers, all of whom said that it must be either diamond or topaz. Subsequently he took it to Prof. Dewey, who immediately pronounced it a diamond—a gem of the purest water, and of exquisite beauty—weighing 19 carats, the largest ever discovered in North America.

The St. Joseph Gazette (Missouri) learns that a memorial has already been forwarded to Washington, asking of the Government permission to establish a newspaper at Fort Leavenworth, which is a military reservation, and so under the immediate control of the War Department. The memorial, it is added, has been signed by all the officers of the Fort, also by many persons living on the Missouri side of the river. The adjacent land not covered by the military reserve is Indian territory, and no white man can settle there without permission from the U. S. authorities; so that the Government has complete control in the premises.

A decision was recently given in a New York Court, of importance to hotel-keepers and travelers, relative to the liability of the former for lost baggage. The mooted question as to what constitutes the personal baggage of a traveler, was entered into at length by the Judge. Gold snuff boxes and opera-glasses were excluded, while a Bible and prayer-book, and a gold letter-seal, valued at fifteen dollars, were allowed. Judgment was rendered for the full amount of loss, excepting the snuff-box and two opera-glasses. The money in the trunk was decided to be at the risk of the owner.

We learn from the Rising Sun (Ia.) News, that Mr. C. Borders and his eldest daughter were drowned in the south branch of Hogan's Creek, on Sunday morning. Six of the family had started to church in a two-horse wagon, and in attempting to ford the stream, which had been swollen by a heavy rain during the previous night, the father and daughter lost their lives. An infant child was one of the company, but it was rescued from a watery grave by the hand of its mother.

A canal boat of the smaller class, hailing from Oswego, and called the George Talcott, says the Troy Whig, arrived at West Troy on the 14th of May. The Talcott is propelled by an engine of thirty-five horse-power, which works a screw-wheel at the stern. The captain says that he left Phœnix, on the Oswego Canal, and twenty-one miles east of Oswego, on the 12th, making the trip to West Troy in two days and a half. This speed is altogether ahead of any time ever yet made on the canals.

Prince Albert has given a new evidence of being a sensible man. A sum of money was raised to erect a statue of him in commemoration of his services in originating and developing the idea of the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations. The Prince has declined the honor of the statue, and suggests that the cash raised for the purpose constitute a fund to be employed for the purpose of the permanent encouragement of the great objects for which the Exhibition was originally instituted.

The case of Charles Walker vs. the Illinois Central Railroad Co., which had been on trial at Chicago for two weeks, was concluded May [illegible]. The plaintiff, Walker, owned a lot on Lake Michigan, a part of which was taken by the Railroad Company for depot purposes, and this action was to recover damages. The Commissioners awarded $47,800, from which award both parties appealed, the Company, however, offering to pay $40,000. The Jury returned a verdict of $20,712.

The last published reports of the Theological Schools in the United States, make the number of students connected with them about one thousand four hundred, some three hundred more than [illegible] in 1838. It is estimated that there are needed [illegible] in this country to supply vacancies made by [illegible] and otherwise, from one to two thousand ministers, exclusive of the number made necessary by the increase of population.

Rev. Dr. Pennington has received a letter from Mr. Grove, the claimant of his brother, who was recently taken back from this city, offering to sell him to Dr. Pennington, should he wish to buy him, and stating that he will await a reply before selling him to the slave-drivers.

At a late communion-season in Midway Church, Liberty county, Georgia, fifty blacks were received into the church, on profession of their faith, most of whom were baptized. At the previous communion, the number received was nearly the same.

The Louisville Democrat gives a statement of the manner in which the Sunday is violated by the swelling foreign population of that city. Three places, known as "Woodland, Magnolia, and Elm Tree Gardens," are filled all day and evening with a noisy crowd, including musicians. It is estimated that on a late Sunday there were in each of these resorts four thousand persons, making an aggregate of not less than twelve thousand.

The Dahlonega (Ga.) Signal announces the death, on May 10, of a Mrs. Rhoda Young, in the one hundred and tenth year of her age. The Signal says: "Mrs. Young was kind and benevolent in feeling, possessing an energy of character rarely equaled. Until a few years past, her daily pursuit was that of gold digging, and so proficient was she in this art, that her name has been spread far and wide."

The U. S. Senate has voted that Congress shall take a recess from July 3d to Oct. 1st, or about three months. In other words, the proposition is that Congress shall legislate and draw pay for thirteen of the sixteen months intervening between its first meeting and the period fixed by the Constitution for its final dissolution.

Dr. Anderson, one of the Secretaries of the American Board, and Rev. Augustus C. Thompson, pastor of the Eliot Church, in Roxbury, Mass., and a member of the Prudential Committee, are about to visit India, as a Deputation of the Board to the several missions under its care in that country.

The question of admitting delegates to the Protestant Episcopal Convention from colored churches, has long been a subject of discussion. At a recent convention this question came up; and, although ably sustained by a number of clergymen and laymen, was voted down by a majority of the lay delegates.

Farmers and blacksmiths will be interested to learn that a man at Allegany City, Pa., has just patented a machine for making horse-shoes, which will, it is said, turn out twenty or twenty-five per minute, perfect in every part. By this machine the price of horse-shoes, it is supposed, will be reduced full 50 per cent.

The State Journal (Columbus) says: There is no danger of famine in Ohio. We assure the timid we never saw the wheat prospects more promising at this season of the year. There will be plenty of grain raised in Ohio this season to supply the inhabitants of four such States; so there is no danger of starvation.

Col. William Rayen, of Youngstown, Ohio, died recently, and bequeathed $100,000 to educate the children of Youngstown. The donor has made provisions that, in case the fund is not sufficient to educate all, the children and wards of the poor are to have the preference.

Rev. J. A. Butler and wife, who have been connected with the Mission of the American Board at South Africa, returned home in the bark "Springbok," which arrived on the 4th of May. They have returned on account of the failure of Mrs. Butler's health.

The Oswego Times of May 31st states that three fugitive slaves had shipped on board the steamer Ontario with the owner in pursuit, who was too late to take out papers for their detention. He had telegraphed to Sackets Harbor to have them stopped.

A terrible explosion of gunpowder took place at Wilmington, Del., June 1st, by which eight or ten lives were lost, fifteen horses killed, seven dwelling houses and six stables blown to pieces, and fifty other houses more or less damaged.

The corporation of London don't know what their tolls on carts and wagons produce, but they report to Parliament that a contractor pays them £5810 a year for the privilege of collecting them.

A dispatch dated Albany, Thursday, June 1, 1854, says: All the buildings of Charlottesville Academy, in Schoharie County, were destroyed by fire yesterday morning. No lives were lost.

Harvest has already commenced in Georgia, and they are rejoicing in new wheat flour. We notice one man who after harvesting his wheat plowed up the stubble and planted corn.

Hay has become so much exhausted in the midland districts of Upper Canada, that it has sold for $45 a tun, and many cattle have perished for the want of it.

A letter from Manchester, Ill., says wheat never looked better than it does this spring, though the chinch-bug threatens destruction to some crops.

The N. Y. Tribune of the 3d inst. contained the names of three hundred and twenty-six persons lost on board the ship Powhatan, on the Jersey shore. Not one escaped.

Mr. Hemans, the son of the poetess, has resided at Rome for more than six years, as the correspondent of a London newspaper. He is a "most exemplary" Roman Catholic.

A Cincinnati paper states that the Covington (Kentucky) Baptist Theological Seminary, opposite Cincinnati, has not now a theological student in it.

A dispatch dated Louisville, Tuesday, May 30, 1854, says: The cholera broke out at Nashville, Tenn., on Sunday last, and fifteen deaths are reported to have occurred from it.

It is stated that the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company have offered $12,000,000 for the Main Line of Pennsylvania Railroad.

The cash receipts of the Erie Railroad for May were about $550,000, the largest ever known in any month.

MARRIED,

In New York City, on the 1st inst., by Eld. Geo. B. Utter, Mr. PINKHAM MOSHER, of Melrose, Westchester Co., N. Y., to Mrs. SARAH ROGERS, widow of the late Capt. H. H. Rogers, of Indianola, Texas.

DIED,

In Truxton, Cortland Co., N. Y., on the 24th day of May, 1854, JOEL PHILLIPS, aged 72 years, 8 months, and 3 days. He had been afflicted with a disease of the lungs for some years, but no immediate danger was apprehended, he being able to pursue his business, till the morning of the 22d, when his disease terminated in a paralysis of the right side of the system, with which he fell to the floor, just as he was about to go out at the door of his house. On the 23d, he seemed to have his senses, and could answer questions by saying yes or no. And questions, whether he felt a reconciliation and peace with God, and safe in his hands, were promptly answered in the affirmative. But on the morning of the 24th, he was past speaking; and a little after 10 o'clock his spirit took its flight, leaving a bereaved companion, and numerous children and friends, to mourn.

The subject of this notice was one of the first settlers on Truxton Hill; and, in those early days, he professed the Christian religion, in connection with a First-day religious society. But after a few years, he was convinced that the seventh day was the true Bible Sabbath, and therefore kept it for some time, dissolving his former connection. And, though his views were never again changed in regard to the Sabbath, yet, by some singular turn of mind, he was led to think that the true seventh day, on this continent, must be the day called Friday. Therefore, retaining this view of the subject till a few days before his last sickness, he never connected himself with the Seventh-day Baptist Church.

A few days before his last sickness, the writer spent an evening with him in a free conversation on the subject. An outline of the arguments presented to his mind would be as follows:—First, we must go upon known facts, and not upon unknown probabilities, on all portions of the earth capable of sustaining them, when first discovered by civilized men; but that all we know of how it came to be so is, that the Lord scattered them at the time of the confusion of languages; and how they got there, or which way they came to their destined abodes, we are not informed. Nor have these savage tribes ever been made the instruments of regulating civilized society. And, thirdly, civilized society, in which the Sabbath has been cherished, was started, and has only progressed, in the light of divine revelation. And it is a fact that, though the day begins a little sooner on the eastern borders of the eastern continent than it does on the western, yet it has no perceptible, or practical effect, any more than it does with us in traveling from New York to Wisconsin, or from Wisconsin to New York. And thus the reckoning of the days, and the regular return of the Sabbath, was actually established throughout the eastern continent, and adjacent islands, so far as it is known at all. Again, it is a fact, that there always has been something like an instinct, in civilized man, to emigrate westward, as the light of day progresses, till they have reached the western borders of this continent, and these regulations have progressed hand in hand with civilized man, and have become an established fact, evidently controlled by the providence of that God who said, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." And then the wide waste of the Pacific ocean lies between, to prevent all confusion in the reckoning. Such was our conversation during the evening. In the morning, our departed friend informed us that, though he did not see it while listening to the argument, yet on thinking it over after he retired, it all became plain to his mind, and he was now satisfied that all we had to do was to take the day as it comes to us in its western progress, wherever we are on the globe.

In his intercourse with men, he was one of the best of neighbors, and a firm supporter of truth and righteousness among men. And any departure from these principles was apt to meet his stern rebuke. He will be greatly missed, and much lamented, in the circles where he moved. But we fondly cherish the hope that his departed spirit is now "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

ELIAS BURDICK.

At Phoenix, R. I., May 15th, 1854, ELIZABETH CRANDALL, wife of John E. Crandall, aged 27 years. Possessed of excellence of character, and mildness of disposition, sister Crandall won the Christian confidence of her friends and acquaintance. She was a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, and evinced her love for the church and the cause of Christ till the very close of life. Her sickness was protracted and very painful, yet borne with Christian resignation. It was her happy lot to enjoy unshaken confidence in Christ as her Saviour, and feel an abiding satisfaction that she should enter that "rest, which remains for the people of God." She was perfectly conscious till the last, so much so that she requested a friend in attendance to close her eyes. This being done, she "fell asleep in Christ."

Water Cure.

MOUNTAIN GLEN WATER CURE AND SUMMER RETREAT, at Plainfield, N. J.

A. UTTER, M. D., Physician and Proprietor.

If beauty and variety of scenery, pureness of air and water, personal professional attention, neatness, cheapness, and good cheer, are requisites of such an institution—these are combined at the Glen.

New York and Erie Railroad.

TRAINS leave pier foot of Duane-st., New York, as follows:

Buffalo Express at 6 A. M. for Buffalo direct, without change of baggage or cars.

Dunkirk Express at 7 A. M. for Dunkirk.

Mail at 8½ A. M. for Dunkirk and Buffalo, and all intermediate stations.

Way Express at 12.45 P. M. for Dunkirk.

Night Express at 6 P. M. for Dunkirk and Buffalo.

Emigrant at 6 P. M.

On Sundays only one express train, at 6 P. M.

These Express Trains connect at Buffalo with first-class splendid steamers on Lake Erie for all ports on the Lake; and at Dunkirk with the Lake Shore Railroad for Cleveland, Cincinnati, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, &c.

Western Association—Executive Board.

THE Executive Board of the Western Association will meet at Alfred Center on the morning of June 22, 1854, previous to the opening of the Association. All communications designed for the action of said Board should be forwarded to the Secretary as early as practicable, that the Board labor under no embarrassment in making their annual report.

E. R. CLARKE, Clerk.

Bound Volumes.

ON hand, and for sale at this office, the first and second volumes of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, bound together, in cloth and leather. Price in cloth $2 50; half roan $2 75; half calf $2 87; half morocco $3 00. Also, the first and second volumes of the Sabbath-School Visitor, bound together in cloth; price $1 00. We have also on hand several sets of the Sabbath Recorder, vols. 2 to 10 inclusive, which will be bound to order for those wishing them, at $2 00 per volume and the cost of binding. As the number of these books is limited, those wishing them should send their orders without delay.

Central Railroad Company of New Jersey.

THE cars will run as follows until further notice, commmencing Monday, April 10, 1854:—

Leave New York at 8 A. M., 12 M., and 4 and 6 P. M.

Leave Plainfield for New York at 7 and 8.30 A.M., 12.50 and 5.10 P.M., passenger, and 7.30 P.M., freight.

Leave Plainfield for Easton at 9.35 A.M., 1.40 and 3.35 P.M., passenger, and 6 30 A.M. freight; and for Somerville at 7.30 P.M.

Passengers will be required to purchase tickets before entering the cars, or pay five cents in addition to the regular fare.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

FOR Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns and process of manufacture so perfected, that their Bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—January, 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (a Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York over all others, several from this country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 18th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order CHIMES of any number of Bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canadas. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with moveable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting upon the Clapper, prolonging the sound; Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For Steamboats, Steamships, etc., their improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to re-hang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all descriptions, made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life—increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proved, beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combinations of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

Office of Transportation, Laurens R R., S. C.,
Aug. 4, 1853.

J. C. Ayer, Dear Sir,—My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever. His throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your Cherry Pectoral in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a tea-spoon full every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better, and after three days use he was able to eat or drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines—but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world. I am yours, with great respect,

J. D. POWELL, Supt. Trans., L. R. R.

Rock Hill, (Somerset Co.,) N. J., July 21, 1852.

Dr. J. C. Ayer,—Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any other cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me

Yours, with respect, JOHN C. WHITLOCK

Windsor, C. W., June 26, 1852.

J. C. Ayer, Sir,—This may certify that I have used your Cherry Pectoral for upwards of one year; and it is my sincere belief that I should have been in my grave ere this time if I had not. It has cured me of a dangerous affection of the lungs, and I do not overstate my convictions when I tell you it is a priceless remedy.

Yours very respectfully,

D. A. McCULLIN, Attorney at Law.

Wilkesbarre, Pa., Sept. 28, 1850.

Dr. J. C. Ayer, My dear Sir,—Your medicine is much approved by those who have used it here, and its composition is such as to insure and maintain its reputation. I invariably recommend it for pulmonary affections, as do many of our principal physicians.

I am your friend, CHAS STREATER, M. D.

Fertilizers.

Farming, on any scale above the rudest and least efficient, has become a business as well as pursuit; it involves commercial ideas and calculations. "Will it pay?" is the vital question—not exactly, "Will the first harvest return the outlay?" but, "Will the twenty, thirty or fifty dollars' outlay suggested be returned with interest in the course of two or three years?" If it will, it is expedient; if not, not, though it might secure most luxurious harvests. Covering a whole farm an inch deep with ammonia might insure splendid crops of most vegetables, at least for one season; but whether it would or would not pay is another question.

Formerly, a farmer plowed and planted, tilled and harvested, and took such returns as it pleased fortune to send him. If he happened to have manure at hand, he sometimes applied it, and sometimes did not; but such a thing as buying fertilizers in large amounts, and every year, never entered his head. His barn-yard was generally cleared out once a year; if he happened to have refuse lime, or more ashes than his wife wanted for soap, he sometimes gave the surplus to his land; but liming a whole farm thoroughly would have been deemed an act of madness in this State less than forty years ago.

The times have changed. Now the good farmer who has given $5,000 for a fair farm does not consider it extravagant to pay $1,000 more for the materials needed to enrich it; he knows that if these add fifty per cent. to the average yield of his acres, his odd $1,000 has stood him instead of $2,500 expended in extending the area of his farm, while the requirements of labor, fencing, taxes, &c., will be fifty per cent. less than such extension would have involved.

The scientific farmer now makes one thousand loads or cords of fertilizing material annually, where his father had but one hundred. He does this by a liberal deposit of swamp muck, forest leaves, &c., under and around his barns; which, together with a little plaster, absorbs liquids and exhalations, precludes offensive odors, and facilitates a proper decomposition. Covering the compost heap, so as to exclude water and fervid sunshine, also prevents waste and dissipation. Weeds, wild grass, the rank growth of vegetation around fences, &c., may all be profitably converted into fertilizing compost by science and labor.

Every farmer who keeps a decent stock of animals can always make his farm richer with each year of cultivation, if he half tries, and without buying the more concentrated fertilizers of commerce. And these, we believe, can never be so cheap and abundant that a good farmer can afford to neglect or waste his old fashioned manures. True, the bulk of these renders their transportation for any considerable distance a losing business; but let them be applied near at hand, while the fields more remote from the barns are treated with Guano, Phosphates, &c., and the farm will gain rapidly and profitably.

Plaster was almost the only fertilizer bought to any extent by inland farmers thirty to forty years ago. The importation and use of Guano, which is about the quickest and most stimulating fertilizer yet discovered, has given a sudden and signal impulse to the use of concentrated or commercial manures. Whole counties at the South, previously exhausted by bad farming, have been speedily renovated by the use of the Peruvian dust, until it is doubtful whether the annual depreciation of Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas through Slavery is not compensated by the extensive and steadily increasing application of Guano. Nothing besides has yet done so much good to the worn out lands of the States just named as Guano; and, though its good effects are soon exhausted under bad cultivation, it by no means follows that they should be. A crop or two of clover, turned in following wheat or oats, stimulated by Guano, would make the Guano remembered for a long series of years. But this, though a popular and immediately efficient, is an expensive manure, and its price ($50 per tun) is very likely to be enhanced. The principal sources of supply are the Chincha Islands, off the coast of Peru, whose government claims them as its property, monopolizes the supply, and puts up the price as fast and as high as the consumers will stand it. If the present yield could find markets at $100 per tun, it would never be sold so low as $99. And the tendency to advance has incited and is only counteracted by the manufacture and use of acceptable substitutes, especially Phosphates and Super-Phosphates.

We presume the reader interested in Agriculture already knows that the basis of these is bone; dissolved in sulphuric acid, and thus rendered pabulum for plants. (There is Phosphate of Lime existing as a mineral deposit, and we mean to speak of one or two beds of it in this country; but as yet they have not been very productive.) Until a few years since, all bones to be found hereabout were gathered up and shipped off to enrich English farms; even the refuse of our bone-black manufactories took that direction. The Phosphate manufacture has nearly stopped this current, and saved this important and excellent fertilizer to be applied to our own soil.

Mr. Alfred F. Kemp, No. 62 Beaver-st., long known as an extensive manufacturer of bone-black at his Eagle Chemical Works on Staten Island, has recently added thereto the production of Super-Phosphate, because he can thus use up the finer portion of his calcined bones, after separating the coarser for bone-black—said finer portion having hitherto been exported to and sold in London for use as a fertilizer. To this calcined bone Mr. K. adds about an equal amount of finely ground, unburnt bone, which contains a considerable per-centage of ammonia. To the mixture he adds some six per cent. of the ordinary Sulphate of Ammonia, and this produces a Super-Phosphate which he sells for $45 per tun, and regards as unsurpassed. We do not know that it is better or worse than its rivals; but the idea of making no mystery of its ingredients, but allowing all rivals to criticise or improve upon them at pleasure, is a good one, and must lead to beneficent results.

The great obstacle to the extensive use of all these concentrated fertilizers is the notorious truth that ninety-nine hundredths of those who use them are "buying a pig in a poke." They know that Phosphate, Guano, Potash, &c., are good; but how can they tell just how much of these ingredients respectively is contained in the compound proffered them? What security have they, unless it be the character of the manufacturers, that the article offered this year is worth half as much per tun as that bearing the same marks which they bought last year?

Our State Agricultural Societies should look to this. They ought to employ competent and reliable chemists to analyze the several Phosphates, Poudrettes, &c., offered for sale—not samples provided by the manufacturers for the purpose, but samples taken from time to time from bags, sold and delivered to unknown customers—and state what the ingredients are, in what proportions commingled, and what is the actual and relative value of each respectively. By this means, fraud would be exposed and imposition prevented. We know that our Societies are weak, and obliged to devote most of their means to premiums and shows; but we do think the duty here indicated is fairly devolved on them, and should be faithfully, fearlessly discharged. A State Society needs its chemist as much as its Secretary, and ought to provide liberally for each. Meantime, we like the idea of having each manufacturer of Phosphates, &c., tell his customers just what are its ingredients, and let others combine better if they can. [N. Y. Tribune.

Maxims for Gardeners.

Grow nothing carelessly; whatever is worth growing at all, is worth growing well.

Many kinds of garden seeds lose their vegetative power, if kept over the first year; be sure, therefore, to sow none but new seeds.

Melons, cucumbers, and other plants of the gourd tribe, form an exception to this rule; their seeds should not be sown until they are several years old, for they will then produce plants with scanty foliage, but abundant fruit.

The seeds of most weeds will retain their vegetative power for an unlimited number of years; take care, therefore, that all weeds are burnt, or, at all events, that they are not thrown on piles, from which they would be liable to be brought back to the garden.

The first leaves which appear above ground (called the seed-leaves) are the sole nourishment of the young plant until it has acquired roots; therefore, if they be destroyed, or seriously injured, the young plant must die.

Seeds will not vegetate unless within the influence of moisture, air, and heat; be careful, therefore, not to sow your seeds too deep, or they will never come up.

Little good is obtained by saving your own seed from common annuals and vegetables; your ground is worth more to you for other purposes than the cost of the quantity of seed which you will require; besides which, you will have a better crop from seed raised in a different soil.

The roots of very young plants are not strong enough to bear removal; the best time for transplanting seedlings is when they have made from four to six leaves; for by this time the roots will be able to perform their proper functions.

Plants, when exposed to the action of light, transmit moisture copiously through their leaves; transplanted seedlings, therefore, and cuttings, should be shaded from the sun until their roots are strong enough to supply moisture as rapidly as it is thrown off.

Roots require that air should be admitted to them; the surface of a clayey soil should therefore be disturbed as often as it begins to cake.

Let unoccupied ground be left in as rough a state as possible during the winter, in order that a large surface may be exposed to the frost, and the soil become thoroughly loosened.

Frost takes effect more readily on roots that have been dug up, than on those which are left in the ground; therefore, either give your store roots complete protection, or let them stay in the ground.

All plants absorb from the ground different juices; a constant variation of crops is, therefore, indispensable.

Leaves absorb and give out moisture, and inhale and exhale air; they are, consequently, the most important organs of a plant, and if they are destroyed, or injured, the whole plant suffers.

The pores in the leaves of the plants, by which they transmit moisture and air, are exceedingly minute, and liable to be choked by exposure to dust; and especially soot; delicate plants should therefore be placed out of the reach of smoke, and if their leaves become soiled they should be washed.

The branches and leaves of plants rarely touch another while growing in a state of nature; learn from this not to crowd plants until the leaves are expanding; in the former case the three buds will bear early flowers; in the latter, they will not begin to expand until the others are in full foliage, and will bloom proportionally later.

The throwing off of its leaves by a newly-planted cutting, is a sign that growth has commenced; on the contrary, when leaves wither on the stem, it is a sign that the plant has not strength to perform the natural function of throwing them off.

When shrubs produce an abundance of foliage, but no flowers, either move them to a poorer soil, or cut through some of the principal roots.

Dry east winds are injurious, by absorbing moisture from the leaves of plants more rapidly than they are prepared to give it out; weather of this kind requires to be guarded against more than the severest frost.

If a grass plot becomes overrun with moss, manure the surface, and the grass will gain strength so as to overcome the intruder.

In all cases of pruning, cut towards you, beginning a little below a bud, but on the opposite side, and ending just above the bud; by this means the wood will be kept alive by the bud, and no water will be able to settle about it and cause it to rot.

Leaves shaded from the light do not acquire depth of color or strength of flavor; gardeners take advantage of this fact, tying up lettuces and earthing celery, that they may be white and mild.

Light is necessary to flowers that they may acquire their proper hues; therefore, when kept in rooms, their place should be as near to the window as possible.

All plants have a season of rest; discover what season is peculiar to each, and choose that season for transplanting.

Plants are in their most active state of growth while in flower; avoid transplanting them at this period, for in all probability they will suffer from the check.

On the contrary, choose the period of flowering in preference to any other for taking cuttings, as they are then most active in forming roots.

Plants, when in bloom, have all their juices in the most perfect state; choose, therefore, the period of their beginning to flower for cutting all aromatic and medicinal herbs.

Profuse flowering exhausts the strength of plants, therefore remove flower-buds before they expand from all newly rooted cuttings and sickly plants.

No plants can bear sudden contrasts of temperature, therefore bring nothing direct from a hot house to the open air. Warm weather should be chosen even for bringing out plants from a green-house.

Remove all dead flowers from perennials, unless you wish to save seed; the plants will thus be prevented from exhausting themselves.

To procure a succession of roses, prune down to three buds on all the branches of some trees as soon as the buds begin to expand; defer the same operation with others until the leaves are expanding; in the former case the three buds will bear early flowers; in the latter, they will not begin to expand until the others are in full foliage, and will bloom proportionally later.

By checking the growth of plants, you throw strength into the flowers and fruit. This is the reason why gardeners nip off the terminal shoots of beans and other such vegetables. On this principle too is founded the valuable art of pruning.

Generally speaking, the smaller the quantity of fruit on a tree, the higher the flavor; therefore, thin all fruits in moderation, but avoid excess. A single gooseberry on a tree, or a single bunch of grapes on a vine, no matter how fine it may be, is a disgrace to good gardening.

Fruit should always be gathered in dry weather, and carefully laid in baskets, not dropped into them. The slightest bruise will cause fruit to decay.

All bulbs and tubers should be placed in the ground before they begin to shoot. If suffered to form leaves and roots in the air, they waste their strength.

Never remove the leaves from bulbs after flowering until they are quite dead. As long as the leaves retain life, they are employed in preparing nourishment, and transmitting it to the roots.

Vegetables that are valued for their juiciness and mild flavor, should be grown quickly. The reverse should be the case when a strong flavor is required.

Though rapid growth is desirable in succulent vegetables, this is not the case with most flowering shrubs, which form bushy, and therefore handsomer plants, when grown slowly.

Few plants thrive in stagnant water; potted plants should therefore always have a thorough drainage of broken pots or brick, and should not be allowed to stand in damp saucers. They require but little water during the winter; but when they begin to grow, they should be liberally supplied.

Plants in pots are more liable to be injured by frost than plants in the ground which are exposed to the same temperature, because the fibres of their roots cling to the sides of the pots, and are soon affected. If they are kept out of doors during the winter, bury the pots in the ground.

All garden hedges should be kept clear of weeds; or when the latter run to seed, they will supply your gardens with a stock against the next season.

What May be Done with Old Rags.

There is a church made of old rags actually existing, near Bergen, which contains nearly one thousand persons. It is circular within, octagonal without. The relievos outside, and the statues within, the roof, the ceiling, the Corinthian capitals, are all of papier-mache, rendered water-proof by saturation in vitriol, lime-water, whey, and white of eggs. We have not yet reached this pitch of audacity in our use of paper; but it should hardly surprise us, inasmuch as we employ the same material in private houses, in steamboats, and in some public buildings, instead of carved decorations and plaster cornices. When Frederic the Second of Prussia set up a limited papier-mache manufactory at Berlin, in 1795, he little thought that paper cathedrals might, within a century, spring out of his snuff-box by the sleight-of-hand of advancing art. At present, we old-fashioned English, who haunt cathedrals and build churches, like stone better. But there is no saying what we may come to. It is not very long since it would have seemed as impossible to cover eighteen acres of ground with glass as to erect a pagoda of soap-bubbles; yet the thing is done. When we think of a psalm sung by one thousand voices pealing through an edifice made of old rags, and the universal element bound down to carry our messages with the speed of light, it would be presumptuous to say what can and what cannot be achieved by science and art under the training of steady old Time. [Dickens.

Gas for Country Use.

By a new invention, people living in towns where no coal gas is or can be profitably formed, may still obtain the luxury of a brilliant home-made gas-light at a cost cheaper than that of the ordinary oil or fluid. The editor of the Boston Post witnessed this important improvement in complete operation a few evenings since, at the residence of a well-known literary and scientific gentleman on Spring Hill, Somerville, Mass.—being the first house into which it had been introduced in this section of the country. The light produced is superior to that of coal gas, being clearer and more powerful, as the flame is of fuller volume and burns with greater steadiness, while the expense is about the same as coal gas at $2 50 per thousand feet. It is the combustion of benzole, a resinous liquid, sold at $1 50 per gallon, mixed with atmospheric air—the gas being generated by an ingenious and not inelegant apparatus, which may stand in the house entry-way, or even be placed on a closet shelf, and from which common gas fixtures may extend in all directions, and give the light in any or every room at pleasure. The apparatus generates no more gas than is immediately consumed, and requires for the purpose only the heat of one of the burners used as a light—so that the whole [illegible] gas is that of the benzole. An appa[illegible] sufficient capacity for a [illegible]-sized dwelling-house is offered for $150. It is so constructed that by means of a rotating air-pump, which is revolved by a cord and a weight wound up by a crank, a stream of air is forced into the generator, which is partially filled with benzole. The generator contains a vaporator exposing a large surface of benzole to the action of the air as the latter is forced through both apartments by the pump and weight, and the thus vaporated benzole, combining with the air, produces a gas of the highest quality for illumination. The apparatus is so perfectly simple, safe and durable, that it may be managed by the dullest domestic, only requiring the weight to be wound up before use, and the generator to be filled twice a month, or not as often unless all the lights are employed.

Steatite or Soapstone.

The railroads of our country are destined to extend immensely the employment of stone as a cheap material for building; first, by discovering and developing choice varieties or quarries during the process of construction; next, by facilitating and cheapening transportation. Forty-eight years ago, stone was taken from the mountains of Berkshire Co., Mass., by wagons forty miles to Hartford, Conn., thence by sloops to Boston, where two fine houses were built of it, which are said be still unaffected by the weather. The expense of transportation, however, was all but ruinous. Now, blocks are taken from the same quarries sixty miles north west by Western Railroad to Albany, thence one hundred and fifty miles south to this City, where they are sawed, cut, polished and sold at as low prices as any building stone in this market, though the Berkshire "Soap-stone" or Steatite is pronounced vastly superior in durability, polish, capacity to withstand trials by fire or water, not only to Brown-stone, but to Marble. We recently looked through the yard of the "Metropolitan Soapstone Company," occupying the block bounded by Ninth and Tenth-avs., Thirteenth and Fourteenth-sts., and believe some account of the work completed there will be interesting and instructive.

The "Soapstone" (so called from its soapy, greasy semblance to the touch,) otherwise termed Freestone, and by geologists Talc or Steatite, is quarried in Middlefield, Hampshire County, Mass., some twenty miles west of Springfield, on the Western Railroad. Thence it is brought without change of cars to the yard already designated, where it is sawed, cut, polished, &c., into all manner of useful and ornamental forms. Whole houses are built of it; oftener, as yet, fronts only; and no durable stone yields more readily to the saw or chisel. Cornices, friezes, &c., are cut with a sharpness and precision hitherto rarely attained, and are said to be indestructible by water, nearly so by fire, and scarcely corrosible by time. Pressed against a large emery wheel, one side of a regular block in a minute becomes as smooth as glass, and the value of the material thus rubbed off is sufficient to pay for the cost of polishing! It is sold by the barrel as the base of paints, lubricating oil for marble dressing, &c. &c. The dressed stone is used to line furnaces, build ovens, encase registers, &c., and finally small blocks of it are sold for feet-warmers during exposure to cold—this stone being very slow to impart or diffuse heat—so that the Shakers who have long used it for ovens certify that they usually heat but once and thereupon bake all day, often baking five or six batches without re-heating. The stone casings to registers are cut one within another until of a large square only a core remains, and of this is made a feet-warmer! Thus, of a car-load of rough stone blocks from the quarry, every particle down to the very dust, is converted to some use, and sold off the premises as fast as produced. Several houses and fronts of this stone have already been erected in New York and Brooklyn. [Tribune.

Facts about Friday.

From time immemorial, Friday has been looked upon as a day of ill-omen; and though this prejudice is less prevalent now than it has been of yore, when superstition had general sway, yet there are many, even in this matter-of-fact age of ours, who would hesitate on a day so inauspicious to begin an undertaking of momentous import. And how many brave mariners, whose hearts unquailed could meet the wildest fury of their ocean home, would blanch to even bend their sails on Friday! But to show with how much reason this feeling is indulged, let us examine the following important facts in connection with our own settlement and greatness as a nation, and we will see how little cause we, Americans, have to dread the fatal day.

On Friday, August 3d, 1492, Christopher Columbus sailed on his great voyage of discovery; on Friday, October 12th, 1492, he first discovered land; on Friday, January 4th, 1493, he sailed on his return to Spain, which if he had not reached in safety, the happy result would never have been known which led to the settlement of this vast country; on Friday, March 15th, 1493, he arrived at Palos in safety; on Friday, November 22d, 1493, he arrived at Hispaniola, in his second voyage to America; on Friday, June 13th, 1494, he, though unknown to himself, discovered the continent of America.

On Friday, March 5th, 1596, Henry VII. of England, gave to John Cabot his commission, which led to the discovery of North America. This is the first American State paper in England. On Friday, September 7th, 1565, Melendez founded St. Augustine, the oldest settlement in the United States by more than forty years. On Friday, November 10th, 1620, the Mayflower, with the Pilgrims made the harbor of Provincetown. On the same day was signed that august compact, the forerunner of our present glorious constitution. On Friday, December 2d, 1620, the Pilgrims made their final landing on Plymouth Rock. On Friday, June 16th, 1775, Bunker Hill was seized and fortified. On Friday, October 8th, 1777, the surrender of Saratoga was made, which had such great power and influence in inducing France to declare for our cause. On Friday, September 22d, 1780, the treason of Arnold was discovered.

On Friday, Oct. 19th, 1781, the surrender at Yorktown, the crowning glory of the American arms. On Friday, June 4th, 1776, the motion in Congress was made by John Adams, seconded by Richard Henry Lee, that the United States colonies were and of right ought to be free and indepen[illegible]. Thus, by [illegible] examples, we see that, [illegible] it may be with the other nations, Americans need never dread to begin on Friday any undertaking, however momentous it may be.

"Long-Tailed Charities."—As we were listening, a few evenings ago, to the conversation of one of the most wise and learned men of these times—a man of wit and humor, withal—we heard these remarks: "On the whole, I don't like long-tailed charities. It is but right that each generation should take care of its own poor, and sick and infirm. Great foundations seldom have a proportionate superstructure. The greater the remove from the life or death of the donor, the greater the probability of abuse or perversion of the gift. What a pity, by the by, that rich men do not see the economy of being their own executors and trustees!—as they are beginning to do, a little, in Boston and elsewhere. When a man of affluence says, 'I am rich enough—I will acquire no more—I will give my income to charity from this date,' he has taken a great step, and soon finds giving—wise and judicious giving—almost as easy as gathering! And then it makes him so happy to see the effects of his benevolence. The frequent wastefulness and mismanagement of corporations is astonishing. Look at Girard College! Sir, liberality with other men's money is one of the virtues that survived the effects of the fall of Adam! I think that in charity, as in every thing else, as little should be done by proxy as may be." [Boston Post.

Great Sailing.—The splendid clipper-ship Flying Cloud, Capt. Cressy, has made the two quickest passages between New York and San Francisco; the first in 89 days and 21 hours; the second in 89 days and 8 hours. She sailed from New York on the 21st of January last. Her best day's work was on the 24th of January, 360 miles in one day. On arriving at San Francisco, she immediately prepared to sail for Hong Kong; 2,000 tuns of merchandise were discharged in five days, and a crew of 40 men shipped in three hours. This may certainly be considered dispatch, and, taken in connection with the previous passages of this vessel, stamps her as the fastest and most extraordinary sailer in the world. She is but three years old; and during that time has performed two voyages around the world, one to San Francisco and back to New York, and is now on her way on her third voyage around the world. Dispatch has marked her course from the commencement of her career, and she now stands on this last trip as having excelled not only the world but herself, and as having performed more since she was built than any other vessel that plows the ocean.

One Hundred Miles of Hedge.—The Illinois Central Railroad Company have contracted with James Sumpter & Co., of Montgomery County, Ohio, for hedging with osage orange one hundred miles of the Illinois Central Railway. The contract commences fifty miles south of Chicago, near the Kankakee River. These two hedges, each one hundred miles long, will require about two millions of osage plants. The ground along the line is to be broken this summer, and the planting to be done in the spring of 1855. The portion to be hedged is through the center of the Grand Prairie of Illinois, where groves are frequently thirty or forty miles apart, and the plants of this hedge will be the only thing in the shape of the tree in sight upon some parts of the line. It will have a very pleasing effect, in breaking the monotony of the landscape and marking out the line of the road.

Patent Elastic Horseshoe.—This invention is calling out numerous eulogiums. The shoe is of German spring steel padded with gum elastic, and it is said will outwear several common shoes. All concussions and consequent heat is avoided, and hence those causes by which so many valuable horses are lamed and ruined, are by this invention almost entirely obviated. A gentleman who has had them upon a very valuable animal for four months, writes to the inventor: "Before applying them, my horse had always shrunk whenever he struck upon the pavement or hard road, but now he strikes boldly and freely, and moves with far greater ease and freedom."

Destiny of Russia.—The author of "The Coming Struggle" has published another book, in which he says that the summary of events in Russia's mission and destiny, as deduced from prophecy, is the following: "1st. He wrests a portion of the Assyrio-Macedonian territory from Turkey, and becomes 'king of the north.' 2d. He overthrows the Turkish power, takes possession of Constantinople, and becomes the 'dragon.' 3d. He conquers the continental nations, and becomes 'Gog of Magog;'" but "he attempts the conquest of Syria and India, and is destroyed with all his hosts, in the valley of Jehosaphat, near Jerusalem."

It is related of the celebrated John Howe, chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, that being often applied to for protection, by men of all parties, in those eventful times, he never refused assistance to any worthy person, whatever his religious views; until one day Cromwell said to him, "Mr. Howe, you have asked favors for everybody except yourself; pray when does your turn come?" "My turn, my lord protector," said Howe, "is always come when I can serve another."

About Honnifah, chief of a Turkish sect, received a blow from a ruffian, and rebuked him in these terms, not unworthy of Christian imitation: "If I were vindictive, I should return you outrage for outrage; if I were an informer, I should accuse you before the caliph; but I prefer putting up a prayer to God, that in the day of judgment he will cause me to enter heaven with you."

A gentleman named Dunlop being present at a party where one of the company had made several puns on the names of persons present, remarked that he had never heard his name punned upon, and did not believe it could be done. "There is nothing in the world more easy, sir," replied the punster; "just lop off half the name, and it is Dun."

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is a most excellent remedy for Coughs and Colds. We have had occasion to try its virtue repeatedly during the winter just closed, and always found its use attended with beneficial results. Those who are afflicted in this way, will do well to try it. It can be had at almost any of the Drug Stores. So says the Hollidaysburg (Pa.) Register.

Great grace and small gifts are better than great gifts and no grace. It doth not say, "the Lord gives gifts and glory," but "the Lord gives grace and glory." Blessed is such an one, to whom the Lord giveth grace, for that is a certain forerunner of glory.

A man has no more right to utter untruths to his own disparagement than to his own praise. Truth is absolute. It is obligatory under all circumstances, and in all relations.

There are truths which some men despise because they have not examined them, and which they will not examine because they despise.
